DEVELOPMENT OF THE PROGRAM

In 1999, the Institute of International Economic Law (IIEL) was established at Georgetown University Law Center and is authorized to appoint a number of outstanding students, visiting professors, or visiting researchers as International Economic Law Fellows (IIEL Fellows). The IIEL Fellows Program encourages scholarly research in the field of international economic law and creates a forum for discussing international economic law issues.

International economic law is extremely broad, covering subjects such as WTO law and policy, national implementation of international economic rules, labor standards, environmental concerns, the impact of globalization on societies, developing country and economic development questions, financial regulations and institutions, and human rights considerations relating to international economic regulation.

The selection of IIEL Fellows is based on demonstrated interest in the field of international economic law. The IIEL Fellowship Selection Committee will make this determination with the concurrence of the Director and Deputy Director of the IIEL. Fellows in this program generally receive no funding assistance. Some Fellows may work as research assistants for the Institute or on related research projects.

For more information about the IIEL and the IIEL Fellows Program, please see the IIEL web site (www.iiel.org), or contact IIEL at: Institute of International Economic Law, Georgetown University Law Center, 600 New Jersey Avenue, NW, Washington, DC 20001.
