Georgetown Law's LL.M. in Global Health Law

is the only program to bring together lawyers and academics from around the world to advance their knowledge and skills through focused studies in core legal and policy courses on global health, individual and public health, human rights, bioethics, economics, biotechnology, and science.

Our graduates move on to prominent positions with U.S. and foreign governments, international organizations, non-governmental organizations, and private sector employers.

For a personal consultation on how you might participate in our LL.M. program, please send an email request to oneillinstitute@law.georgetown.edu.
