John D. Kraemer, JD, MPH
Assistant Professor, School of Nursing and Health Studies, Georgetown University

John Kraemer is an assistant professor in the School of Nursing & Health Studies’ Department of Health Systems Administration, and he is affiliated with the law center’s O’Neill Institute for National and Global Health Law and the School of Foreign Service’s African Studies Program. Trained in both public health and the law, his work focuses on the improvement of health policy through evidence-based and normative approaches. His work focuses on women’s and children’s health in sub-Saharan Africa, road safety for vulnerable road users, and American public health law. His current and past projects have been with the Pink Ribbon Red Ribbon initiative against women’s cancers, the United Nations Special Envoy for Malaria, and the District of Columbia government. John is also an adjunct professor at Georgetown Law, and he works with the monitoring and evaluation team at Tiyatien Health, a non-profit providing clinical and community-based services in rural Liberia. At Georgetown, John teaches graduate epidemiology, both at the School of Nursing & Health Studies and at the law school, and undergraduate health disparities, health law and ethics, and global health law.
