

DECISION ISSUED ON AUGUST 31, 2020

No. 19-5331

---

IN THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA CIRCUIT

---

COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY OF THE
UNITED STATES HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Appellee,

v.

DONALD F. MCGAHN, II,

Appellant.

---

On Appeal from the United States District Court for the District of Columbia
(No. 1:19-cv-2379) (Hon. Ketanji Brown Jackson, District Judge)

---

PETITION FOR REHEARING EN BANC OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY OF THE U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

---

Matthew S. Hellman
Elizabeth B. Deutsch
JENNER & BLOCK LLP
1099 New York Avenue NW
Washington, D.C. 20001
(202) 639-6000

Annie L. Owens
Joshua A. Geltzer
Seth Wayne
INSTITUTE FOR CONSTITUTIONAL
ADVOCACY AND PROTECTION
Georgetown University Law Center
600 New Jersey Avenue NW
Washington, D.C. 20001
(202) 662-9042

Douglas N. Letter
General Counsel
Todd B. Tatelman
Megan Barbero
Josephine Morse
Adam A. Grogg
William E. Havemann
Lisa K. Helvin
Jonathan B. Schwartz
OFFICE OF GENERAL COUNSEL
U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
219 Cannon House Office Building
Washington, D.C. 20515
(202) 225-9700
douglas.letter@mail.house.gov

Counsel for Appellee

CERTIFICATE AS TO PARTIES, RULINGS, AND RELATED CASES

Pursuant to D.C. Circuit Rule 35(c), the undersigned counsel certifies as follows:

A. Parties and Amici

Plaintiff-appellee is the United States House of Representatives Committee on the Judiciary. Defendant-appellant is Donald F. McGahn, II.

The following appeared as amici curiae for plaintiff-appellee during the proceedings before the panel: Steve Bartlett (U.S. House of Representatives (R-Texas), 1983-1991); Jack Buechner (U.S. House of Representatives (R-Missouri), 1987-1991); Tom Coleman (U.S. House of Representatives (R-Missouri), 1976-1993); George T. Conway, III; Mickey Edwards (U.S. House of Representatives (R-Oklahoma), 1977-1993); Stuart M. Gerson (Acting Attorney General of the United States, 1993, Assistant Attorney General, Civil Division, 1989-1993); Gordon J. Humphrey (U.S. Senate (R-New Hampshire), 1979-1990); Bob Inglis (U.S. House of Representatives (R-South Carolina), 1993-1999, 2005-2011); Jim Kolbe (U.S. House of Representatives (R-Arizona), 1985-2007); Steven T. Kuykendall (U.S. House of Representatives (R-California), 1999-2001); Jim Leach (U.S. House of Representatives (R-Iowa), 1977-2007); Mike Parker (U.S. House of Representatives (R-Mississippi), 1989-1999); Thomas Petri (U.S. House of Representatives (R-Wisconsin), 1979-2015); Trevor Potter (Chair, Federal Election Commission, 1994); Reid Ribble (U.S. House of Representatives (R-Wisconsin), 2011-2017); Jonathan C. Rose (Special Assistant to the President, 1971-1973, Assistant Attorney General, Office of Legal Policy, 1981-1984); Paul Rosenzweig (Deputy Assistant Secretary for Policy, Department of Homeland Security, 2005-2008); Peter Smith (U.S. House of Representatives (R-Vermont), 1989-1991); J. W. Verret (Associate Professor of Law, George Mason University Antonin Scalia Law School); and Dick Zimmer (U.S. House of Representatives (R-New Jersey), 1991-1997). James M. Murray filed a motion for leave to participate as an amicus on appeal that was denied.

The following appeared as amici curiae for plaintiff-appellee in support of rehearing en banc: Thomas Andrews (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Maine), 1991-1995); William Baer (U.S. Acting Associate Attorney General, 2016-2017, U.S. Assistant Attorney General for the Antitrust Division, 2013-2016); Brian Baird (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Washington), 1999-2011); Michael Barnes (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Maryland), 1979-1987); Steve Bartlett (U.S. House of Representatives (R-Texas), 1983-1991); Douglas Bereuter (U.S. House of Representatives (R-Nebraska), 1979-2004); Howard Berman (U.S. House of Representatives (D-California), 1983-2013); Rich Boucher (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Virginia), 1983-2011); Barbara Boxer (U.S. Senate (D-California), 1993-2017, U.S. House of Representatives (D-California), 1983-1993); Bruce Braley (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Iowa), 2007-2015); Amb. Carol Moseley Braun (U.S. Senate (D-Illinois), 1993-1999); Roland Burris (U.S. Senate (D-Illinois), 2009-2010); Lois Capps (U.S. House of Representatives (D-California), 1997-2017); Jean Carnahan (U.S. Senate (D-Missouri), 2001-2002); Robert Carr (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Michigan), 1975-1981, 1983-1995); Rod Chandler (U.S. House of Representatives (R-Washington), 1983-1993); Linda Chavez (White House Director of Public Liaison, 1985; Chairman, National Commission on Migrant Education, 1988-1992); Bill Cohen (U.S. Secretary of Defense, 1997-2001, U.S. Senate (R-Maine), 1979-1997, U.S. House of Representatives (R-Maine), 1973-1979); James Cole (U.S. Deputy Attorney General, 2010-2015); Tom Coleman (U.S. House of Representatives (R-Missouri), 1976-1993); Jerry Costello (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Illinois), 1987-2013); Mark S. Critz (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Pennsylvania), 2010-2013); Joe Crowley (U.S. House of Representatives (D-New York), 1999-2019); Tom Daschle (U.S. Senate (D-South Dakota), 1987-2005, U.S. House of Representatives (D-South Dakota), 1979-1987); Lincoln Davis (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Tennessee), 2003-2011); Mark Dayton (U.S. Senate (D-Minnesota), 2001-2007); John W. Dean (White House Counsel, 1970-1973, Associate Deputy Attorney General, 1969-1970); Dennis DeConcini (U.S. Senate (D-Arizona), 1977-1995); Chris Dodd (U.S. Senate (D-Connecticut), 1981-2001, U.S. House of Representatives (D-Connecticut), 1975-1981); Byron Dorgan (U.S. Senate (D-North Dakota), 1992-2011, U.S. House of Representatives (D-North Dakota), 1981-1992); Steve Driehaus (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Ohio), 2009-2011); David Durenberger (U.S. Senate (R-Minnesota), 1978-1995); Donna Edwards (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Maryland), 2008-2017); Mickey Edwards (U.S. House of Representatives (R-Oklahoma), 1977-1993); Sam Farr (U.S. House of Representatives (D-California), 1993-2013); Vic Fazio (U.S. House of Representatives (D-California), 1979-1999); Emil Frankel (Assistant Secretary for Transportation Policy, U.S. Department of Transportation, 2002-2005); Martin Frost (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Texas), 1979-2005); Richard Gephardt (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Missouri), 1977-2005); Stuart M. Gerson (Acting Attorney General of the United States, 1993, Assistant Attorney General, Civil Division, 1989-1993); Wayne Gilchrest (U.S. House of Representatives (R-Maryland), 1991-2009); Dan Glickman (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Kansas), 1977-1995); Michael Greenberger (U.S. Principal Deputy Associate Attorney General, 1999-2001, Counselor to the U.S. Attorney General, 1999); Jimmy Gurulé (Assistant Attorney General, Department of Justice, 1990–1992, Assistant U.S. Attorney, 1985–1989, Under Secretary for Enforcement, Department of the Treasury, 2001–2003); Tom Harkin (U.S. Senate (D-Iowa), 1985–2015, U.S. House of Representatives (D-Iowa), 1975–1985); Paul Hodes (U.S. House of Representatives (D-New Hampshire), 2007–2011); Elizabeth Holtzman (U.S. House of Representatives (D-New York), 1973–1981); Gordon J. Humphrey (U.S. Senate (R-New Hampshire), 1979–1990); Bob Inglis (U.S. House of Representatives (R-South Carolina), 1993–1999, 2005–2011); Steve Israel (U.S. House of Representatives (D-New York), 2001–2017); J. Bennett Johnston (U.S. Senate (D-Louisiana), 1972–1997); David Jolly (U.S. House of Representatives (R-Florida), 2014–2017); Steve Kagen (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Wisconsin), 2007–2011); Leon Kellner (U.S.

Attorney for the Southern District of Florida, 1985–1988); Bob Kerrey (U.S. Senate (D-Nebraska), 1989–2001); Mary Jo Kilroy (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Ohio), 2009–2011); Paul G. Kirk, Jr. (U.S. Senate (D-Massachusetts), 2009–2010); Ron Klein (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Florida), 2007–2011); James Kolbe (U.S. House of Representatives (R-Arizona), 1985–2007); Mike Kopetski (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Oregon), 1991–1995); Bob Krueger (U.S. Senate (D-Texas), 1993, U.S. House of Representatives (D-Texas), 1975–1979); Steven T. Kuykendall (U.S. House of Representatives (R-California), 1999–2001); Larry LaRocco (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Idaho), 1991–1995); James Leach (U.S. House of Representatives (R-Iowa), 1977–2007); John LeBoutillier (U.S. House of Representatives (R-New York), 1981–1983); Mel Levine (U.S. House of Representatives (D-California), 1983–1993); Matthew McHugh (U.S. House of Representatives (D-New York), 1975–1993); John McKay (U.S. Attorney for the Western District of Washington, 2001–2007); Tom McMillen (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Maryland), 1987–1993); Brad Miller (U.S. House of Representatives (D-North Carolina), 2003–2013); Walt Minnick (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Idaho), 2009–2011); Connie Morella (U.S. House of Representatives (R-Maryland), 1987–2003); Leon Panetta (U.S. Secretary of Defense, 2011–2013, Director, Central Intelligence Agency, 2009–2011, White House Chief of Staff, 1994–1997, Director, Office of Management and Budget, 1993–1994, U.S. House of Representatives (D-California), 1977–1993); Earl Pomeroy (U.S. House of Representatives (D-North Dakota), 1993–2011); Trevor Potter (Chair, Federal Election Commission, 1994, Commissioner, Federal Election Commission, 1991–1995); Silvestre Reyes (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Texas), 1997–2013); Max Sandlin (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Texas), 1997–2005); James Sasser (U.S. Senate (D-Tennessee), 1977–1995); Claudine Schneider (U.S. House of Representatives (R-Rhode Island), 1981–1991); Pat Schroeder (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Colorado), 1973–1997); Allyson Schwartz (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Pennsylvania), 2005–2015); Christopher Shays (U.S. House of Representatives (R-Connecticut), 1987–2009); David Skaggs (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Colorado), 1987–1999); Peter Smith (U.S. House of Representatives (R-Vermont), 1989–1991); Alan Steelman (U.S. House of Representatives (R-Texas), 1973–1977); Charlie Stenholm (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Texas), 1979–2005); Bart Stupak (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Michigan), 1993–2011); John Tierney (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Massachusetts), 1997–2015); Jim Turner (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Texas), 1997–2005); Henry Waxman (U.S. House of Representatives (D-California), 1975–2015); Kimberly L. Wehle (Assistant U.S. Attorney, Civil Division, 1997–1999, Associate Independent Counsel, Whitewater Investigation, 1996–1997); Robert Weiner (Senior Counsel in White House, 1997–1998); Christie Todd Whitman (Administrator, Environmental Protection Agency, 2001–2003); Lawrence Wilkerson (Chief of Staff to U.S. Secretary of State, 2002–2005); and Dick Zimmer (U.S. House of Representatives (R-New Jersey), 1991–1997).

The following appeared as amici curiae for plaintiff-appellee during the en banc proceedings: Former General Counsels (William Pittard, Kerry W. Kircher, Irvin B. Nathan, Geraldine R. Gennet, Thomas J. Spulak, Charles Tiefer, Steven R. Ross, Stanley Brand); Nixon Impeachment Scholars (Michael Dorf, Michael A. Genovese, Michael J. Gerhardt, Eric Lane, Alan J. Lichtman, Rick Perlstein, Kermit Roosevelt, Laurence H. Tribe); Legal Scholars (Cynthia Boyer, William M. Brooks, Ronald K. Chen, S. Alan Childress, Michael G. Collins, John N. Drobak, Mary L. Dudziak, Heather Elliott, Barry Friedman, Michael J. Gerhardt, Matthew I. Hall, Andrew Hammond, Christoph Henkel, Helen Hershkoff, Aziz Z. Huq, Doron M. Kalir, Corinna Barrett Lain, Jonathan R. Nash, Michael J. Perry, Edward A. Purcell, Jr., Joan M. Shaughnessy, Andrew M. Siegel, David Sloss, Stephen F. Smith, Maxwell Stearns); Former Department of Justice Officials (Evan H. Caminker, Neil J. Kinkopf, Joseph Onek, Peter M. Shane, Judith Welch Wegner, Elliot Williams, and William R. Yeomans); Niskanen Center; Lugan Center and Levin Center; Morton Rosenberg; and the following Former Members of Congress: Thomas Andrews (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Maine), 1991-1995); Brian Baird (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Washington), 1999-2011); Michael Barnes (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Maryland), 1979-1987); John Barrow (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Georgia), 2005–2015); Douglas Bereuter (U.S. House of Representatives (R-Nebraska), 1979-2004); Howard Berman (U.S. House of Representatives (D-California), 1983-2013); Rich Boucher (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Virginia), 1983-2011); Barbara Boxer (U.S. Senate (D-California), 1993-2017, U.S. House of Representatives (D-California), 1983-1993); Bruce Braley (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Iowa), 2007-2015); Amb. Carol Moseley Braun (U.S. Senate (D-Illinois), 1993-1999); Roland Burris (U.S. Senate (D-Illinois), 2009-2010); Lois Capps (U.S. House of Representatives (D-California), 1997-2017); Jean Carnahan (U.S. Senate (D-Missouri), 2001-2002); Robert Carr (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Michigan), 1975-1981, 1983-1995); Rod Chandler (U.S. House of Representatives (R-Washington), 1983-1993); Bill Cohen (U.S. Secretary of Defense, 1997-2001, U.S. Senate (R-Maine), 1979-1997, U.S. House of Representatives (R-Maine), 1973-1979); Jerry Costello (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Illinois), 1987-2013); Mark S. Critz (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Pennsylvania), 2010-2013); Joe Crowley (U.S. House of Representatives (D-New York), 1999-2019); Tom Daschle (U.S. Senate (D-South Dakota), 1987-2005, U.S. House of Representatives (D-South Dakota), 1979-1987); Lincoln Davis (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Tennessee), 2003-2011); Mark Dayton (U.S. Senate (D-Minnesota), 2001-2007); Dennis DeConcini (U.S. Senate (D-Arizona), 1977-1995); Chris Dodd (U.S. Senate (D-Connecticut), 1981-2001, U.S. House of Representatives (D-Connecticut), 1975-1981); Byron Dorgan (U.S. Senate (D-North Dakota), 1992-2011, U.S. House of Representatives (D-North Dakota), 1981-1992); Steve Driehaus (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Ohio), 2009-2011); David Durenberger (U.S. Senate (R-Minnesota), 1978-1995); Donna Edwards (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Maryland), 2008-2017); Sam Farr (U.S. House of

Representatives (D-California), 1993-2013); Vic Fazio (U.S. House of Representatives (D-California), 1979-1999); Barney Frank (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Massachusetts), 1981-2013); Martin Frost (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Texas), 1979-2005); Richard Gephardt (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Missouri), 1977-2005); Wayne Gilchrest (U.S. House of Representatives (R-Maryland), 1991-2009); Dan Glickman (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Kansas), 1977-1995); Gene Green (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Texas), 1993-2019); Colleen Hanabusa (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Hawaii), 2011–2015, 2016–2019); Tom Harkin (U.S. Senate (D-Iowa), 1985–2015, U.S. House of Representatives (D-Iowa), 1975–1985); Gary Hart (U.S. Senate (D-Colorado), 1975-1987); Paul Hodes (U.S. House of Representatives (D-New Hampshire), 2007–2011); Elizabeth Holtzman (U.S. House of Representatives (D-New York), 1973–1981); Steve Israel (U.S. House of Representatives (D-New York), 2001–2017); J. Bennett Johnston (U.S. Senate (D-Louisiana), 1972–1997); David Jolly (U.S. House of Representatives (R-Florida), 2014–2017); Steve Kagen (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Wisconsin), 2007–2011); Bob Kerrey (U.S. Senate (D-Nebraska), 1989–2001); Mary Jo Kilroy (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Ohio), 2009–2011); Paul G. Kirk, Jr. (U.S. Senate (D-Massachusetts), 2009–2010); Ron Klein (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Florida), 2007–2011); Mike Kopetski (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Oregon), 1991–1995); Bob Krueger (U.S. Senate (D-Texas), 1993, U.S. House of Representatives (D-Texas), 1975–1979); Nick Lampson (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Texas), 1997-2005,

2007-2009); Larry LaRocco (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Idaho), 1991–1995); John LeBoutillier (U.S. House of Representatives (R-New York), 1981–1983); Mel Levine (U.S. House of Representatives (D-California), 1983–1993); Matthew McHugh (U.S. House of Representatives (D-New York), 1975–1993); Tom McMillen (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Maryland), 1987–1993); Brad Miller (U.S. House of Representatives (D-North Carolina), 2003–2013); George Miller (U.S. House of Representatives (R-California), 1975-2015); Walt Minnick (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Idaho), 2009–2011); Connie Morella (U.S. House of Representatives (R-Maryland), 1987–2003); Leon Panetta (U.S. Secretary of Defense, 2011–2013, Director, Central Intelligence Agency, 2009–2011, White House Chief of Staff, 1994–1997, Director, Office of Management and Budget, 1993–1994, U.S. House of Representatives (D-California), 1977–1993); Earl Pomeroy (U.S. House of Representatives (D-North Dakota), 1993–2011); Silvestre Reyes (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Texas), 1997–2013); Max Sandlin (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Texas), 1997–2005); James Sasser (U.S. Senate (D-Tennessee), 1977–1995); Claudine Schneider (U.S. House of Representatives (R-Rhode Island), 1981–1991); Pat Schroeder (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Colorado), 1973–1997); Allyson Schwartz (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Pennsylvania), 2005–2015); Christopher Shays (U.S. House of Representatives (R-Connecticut), 1987–2009); David Skaggs (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Colorado), 1987–1999); Alan Steelman (U.S. House of Representatives (R-Texas), 1973–1977); Charlie Stenholm (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Texas), 1979–2005); Bart Stupak (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Michigan), 1993–2011); John Tierney (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Massachusetts), 1997–2015); Jim Turner (U.S. House of Representatives (D-Texas), 1997–2005); Henry Waxman (U.S. House of Representatives (D-California), 1975–2015); Timothy Wirth (U.S. Senate (D-Colorado), 1987-1993, U.S. House of Representatives (D-Colorado), 1975-1987).

No amici participated in the district court proceedings.

B. Rulings Under Review

Defendant-appellant sought review of the order and opinion of the district court granting partial summary judgment in favor of the Committee on Judiciary, denying McGahn’s motion for summary judgment, declaring that McGahn is not immune from Congressional process, and enjoining McGahn to comply with the Committee’s subpoena. Comm. on Judiciary, U.S. House of Representatives v. McGahn, 415 F.Supp.3d 148 (D.D.C. Nov. 25, 2019) (Ketanji Brown Jackson, J.). See JA847-966 (opinion); JA967-68 (order). A panel of this Court initially reversed that determination on standing grounds. Comm. on Judiciary, U.S. House of Representatives v. McGahn, 951 F.3d 510 (D.C. Cir. 2020). This Court granted the Committee’s petition for en banc review, affirmed the district court’s standing determination, and remanded the case to the panel for further proceedings. Comm. on Judiciary, U.S. House of Representatives v. McGahn, 968 F.3d 755 (D.C. Cir. 2020) (“McGahn En Banc Op.”), A22. On remand, the panel again reversed the district court and held that the Committee lacked a cause of action to seek relief. Comm. on Judiciary, U.S. House of Representatives v. McGahn, ___F.3d___, 2020 WL 5104869 (Aug. 31, 2020) (“McGahn IP”), A1. This Petition for Rehearing En Banc seeks review of that panel decision.

C. Related Cases

This case has not previously been before this Court or any other. Some of the same or similar legal issues, however, are presented in United States House of Representatives v. Mnuchin et al., No. 19-5176 (currently pending after remand by the en banc court), Committee on Ways and Means, U.S. House of Representatives v. Department of Treasury, et al., No. 19-cv-1974-TNM (D.D.C.), and Committee on Oversight and Reform, U.S. House of Representatives v. Barr, et al., No. 19-cv-3557-RDM (D.D.C.).

/s/ Douglas N. Letter

DOUGLAS N. LETTER

Counsel for the Committee on the Judiciary of the U.S. House of Representatives

TABLE OF CONTENTS

CERTIFICATE AS TO PARTIES, RULINGS, AND RELATED CASES.....i

TABLE OF CONTENTS ..... xiii

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES ..... xiv

GLOSSARY..... xvi

INTRODUCTION AND RULE 35(b) STATEMENT..... 1

STATEMENT..... 3

REASONS FOR GRANTING REHEARING EN BANC..... 4

    I. THE PANEL’S DECISION CONFLICTS WITH BINDING SUPREME COURT
    PRECEDENT. .... 4

    II. THE PANEL’S DECISION WILL IMPEDE CONGRESSIONAL INVESTIGATIONS
    AND OVERSIGHT..... 13

    III. THE EN BANC COURT SHOULD RESOLVE THE REMAINING ISSUES IN THIS MATTER. .... 15

CONCLUSION ..... 16

CERTIFICATE OF COMPLIANCE

CERTIFICATE OF SERVICE

ADDENDUM

TABLE OF AUTHORITIES*

Cases

Alexander v. Sandoval , 532 U.S. 275 (2001) .....	11
Ali v. Rumsfeld , 649 F.3d 762 (D.C. Cir. 2011) .....	13
* Armstrong v. Exceptional Child Center, Inc. , 575 U.S. 320 (2015).....	7, 9, 12
Committee on the Judiciary v. McGahn , 951 F.3d 510 (D.C. Cir. 2020).....	4, 14, 15-16
Committee on the Judiciary v. Miers , 558 F. Supp. 2d 53 (D.D.C. 2008).....	4, 12, 15
Committee on Oversight &amp; Government Reform v. Holder , 979 F. Supp. 2d 1 (D.D.C. 2013).....	3-4, 12, 15
* Free Enterprise Fund v. Public Co. Accounting Oversight Board , 561 U.S. 477 (2010).....	2, 5, 7, 8, 9
Grupo Mexicano de Desarrollo, S.A. v. Alliance Bond Fund, Inc. , 527 U.S. 308 (1999).....	9, 10
Hernandez v. Mesa , 140 S. Ct. 735 (2020) .....	10, 11
* McGrain v. Daugherty , 273 U.S. 135 (1927) .....	1, 4, 5, 6, 9, 14
Nixon v. Administrator of General Services , 433 U.S. 425 (1977) .....	15
* Quinn v. United States , 349 U.S. 155 (1955).....	1, 4, 8, 9, 14
Reed v. County Commissioners of Delaware County , 277 U.S. 376 (1928).....	11
* Trump v. Mazars USA, LLP , 140 S. Ct. 2019 (2020) .....	passim
Trump v. Vance , 140 S. Ct. 2412 (2020).....	2, 10
United States v. AT&amp;T , 551 F.2d 384 (D.C. Cir. 1976).....	12, 13, 15
United States v. AT&amp;T , 567 F.2d 121 (D.C. Cir. 1977).....	2, 8, 10
Watkins v. United States , 354 U.S. 178 (1957) .....	5, 13

---

* Authorities upon which we chiefly rely are marked with an asterisk.

Webster v. Doe, 486 U.S. 592 (1988)..... 12

Ex Parte Young, 209 U.S. 123 (1908)..... 8

Ziglar v. Abbasi, 137 S. Ct. 1843 (2017) ..... 10, 11

Statutes

2 U.S.C. § 288d ..... 12

28 U.S.C. § 1365 ..... 12

28 U.S.C. § 2201 ..... 12

Other Authorities

Prosecution for Contempt of Congress of an Executive Branch Official Who Has Asserted a Claim of Executive Privilege, 8 Op. O.L.C. 101 (1984) ..... 9

*Response to Congressional Requests for Information Regarding Decisions Made
Under the Independent Counsel Act*, 10 Op. O.L.C. 68 (1986) ..... 9

GLOSSARY

A__	Addendum to Petition for Rehearing En Banc
Committee	Committee on the Judiciary of the U.S. House of Representatives
McGahn En Banc Op.	Comm. on Judiciary, U.S. House of Representatives v. McGahn , 968 F.3d 755 (D.C. Cir. 2020), A22.
McGahn II	Comm. on Judiciary, U.S. House of Representatives v. McGahn , __F.3d__, 2020 WL 5104869 (Aug. 31, 2020), A1.
DOJ	U.S. Department of Justice
JA__	Joint Appendix
McGahn	Donald F. McGahn, II
OLC	Office of Legal Counsel, U.S. Department of Justice

INTRODUCTION AND RULE 35(b) STATEMENT

A divided Panel of this Court has again hamstrung the House's constitutional right to obtain information. It has done so in the immediate wake of the Supreme Court's decision reaffirming that right as essential to our system of government, Trump v. Mazars USA, LLP, 140 S. Ct. 2019, 2031 (2020), and this Court's en banc decision holding that "constitutional structure and historical practice" require that right to be subject to "judicial enforcement ... when necessary," McGahn En Banc Op. at 4, A25. When this same divided Panel last attempted to close the courts to the House and insulate the Executive Branch from oversight, this Court granted en banc review and reversed. Intervention by the en banc Court is again required.

The Panel's decision is déjà vu all over again. Start with its misreading of Supreme Court precedent. In the Panel's view, Article I provides a Congressional power of inquiry, but no right to judicial enforcement. But in Mazars, the Supreme Court confirmed as "an essential and appropriate auxiliary to the legislative function" not just the "power of inquiry," but also the "process to enforce it." 140 S. Ct. at 2031 (quoting McGrain v. Daugherty, 273 U.S. 135, 174 (1927)).

Mazars was not a bolt from the blue. It followed nearly a century of Supreme Court precedent reflecting the commonsense understanding that Congress's "broad and indispensable" "power to secure needed information," id. (quotation marks omitted), comes with the authority to enforce that power. See McGrain, 273 U.S. at 174; Quinn v. United States, 349 U.S. 155, 160-61 (1955) (noting Congress's "authority to compel testimony, either through its own process or through judicial trial”);

McGahn II Dis. at 2, A11.

The Panel’s resort to history fares no better. Echoing its earlier decision, the Panel declared that the relative lack of historical suits by Congress to enforce subpoenas places this action outside the scope of the Judiciary’s “traditional equitable powers.” McGahn II at 4-5, A4-A5; see McGahn En Banc Op. at 4, A25. But as the en banc Court explained, that lack of litigation likely reflects only the “apparently unprecedented categorical direction” by President Trump to defy Congress at every turn. McGahn En Banc Op. at 36, A57. In any event, the relevant history is the “established practice” for federal courts to “issue injunctions to protect rights safeguarded by the Constitution.” Free Enter. Fund v. Pub. Co. Acct. Oversight Bd., 561 U.S. 477, 491 n.2 (2010) (quoting Bell v. Hood, 327 U.S. 678, 684 (1946)). There is no reason that equity should be uniquely unavailable to Congress in the context of subpoena enforcement—especially when equity is available to the President and the Executive Branch for their challenges to Congressional subpoenas in cases such as Mazars, 140 S. Ct. 2019, and United States v. AT&T, 567 F.2d 121, 122-23, 130-31 (D.C. Cir. 1977) (“AT&T I”). Cf. Trump v. Vance, 140 S. Ct. 2412 (2020).

To be sure, the Panel sought to wash its hands of the consequences of depriving the House of the ability to carry out its Article I powers by suggesting that Congress, if it so chose, could empower the House to sue. But that misses the point. The Constitution empowers the House to bring this action like it permits other litigants to seek equitable relief for constitutional injuries. Just as the en banc Court recognized it is not the Judiciary's prerogative to close the courthouse doors to the House on standing grounds, so, too, it cannot close the doors to equitable relief.

It is time for the en banc Court to resolve this matter so that the House can finally act upon its subpoena and obtain the information it requires to carry out its constitutional responsibilities. All the remaining issues are fully ventilated and appropriate for resolution by the full court. This petition for rehearing en banc should be granted, and the district court's decision should be affirmed.

STATEMENT

As part of its ongoing investigation of Presidential misconduct, improper political interference in federal law-enforcement matters, and related agency oversight—and only after repeated attempts to reach an accommodation with the White House—the Committee brought this action to enforce a subpoena to obtain McGahn's testimony. House Panel Br. 5-9.

The district court held that the Committee had suffered a cognizable Article III injury and had a cause of action to sue. JA936-49. The court also confirmed its subject-matter jurisdiction and determined that McGahn did not have "absolute immunity." JA 909-28, JA957-64.<sup>1</sup>

---

<sup>1</sup> District Judges Bates and Berman Jackson have also concluded that Committees of the House have a cause of action to sue to enforce subpoenas and that such suits fall within federal courts' subject-matter jurisdiction. See Comm. on Oversight

A divided Panel reversed, finding that the Committee lacked standing. Comm. on Judiciary v. McGahn, 951 F.3d 510, 531 (D.C. Cir. 2020) (“McGahn P”). This Court granted rehearing en banc and reversed the Panel. The en banc Court held that the Committee has standing to sue to enforce its subpoena and that “constitutional structure and historical practice support judicial enforcement of congressional subpoenas when necessary.” McGahn En Banc Op. at 4, A25.

On remand, the Panel, again over Judge Rogers’s dissent, once more reversed the district court, holding that the Committee had no cause of action to sue to enforce its subpoena power. McGahn II at 2, A2.

REASONS FOR GRANTING REHEARING EN BANC

I. THE PANEL’S DECISION CONFLICTS WITH BINDING SUPREME COURT PRECEDENT.

A. The Panel’s decision contravenes two strands of Supreme Court precedent, which, taken together, firmly establish the Committee’s ability to sue pursuant to Article I of the Constitution to enforce compliance with its subpoena. First, in an unbroken line from McGrain to Quinn to Mazars, the Supreme Court has recognized that Article I bestows on Congress the power to compel testimony in fulfillment of its constitutional duties. See McGrain, 273 U.S. at 174; Quinn, 349 U.S. at 160-61; Mazars, 140 S. Ct. at 2026. Second, the Supreme Court has long permitted suits in equity to remedy constitutional violations, including in cases involving the separation of powers. See, e.g., Free Enter. Fund, 561 U.S. at 491 n.2. Together, these cases lead to a straightforward conclusion: Equity is available to remedy the House’s constitutional injury, just as it is available to protect other rights under the Constitution. The Panel’s contrary conclusion demands en banc review.

---

Gov’t Reform v. Holder, 979 F. Supp. 2d 1, 17-20, 22-24 (D.D.C. 2013); Comm. on the Judiciary v. Miers, 558 F. Supp. 2d 53, 64-65, 88, 94 (D.D.C. 2008).

1. The power to investigate depends on the power to enforce. The Supreme Court in Mazars recognized this point when it reaffirmed that Congress’s power to “obtain information” is both “‘broad’ and ‘indispensable,’” 140 S. Ct. at 2031 (quoting Watkins v. United States, 354 U.S. 178, 187, 215 (1957))—even in the context of a case concerning Congressional subpoenas “directed at the President’s personal information,” see id. at 2035. A necessary part of each House’s “power of inquiry” is a corollary power “to enforce it.” Id. (quoting McGrain, 273 U.S. at 174). Without the “essential” inquiry power—and the “process to enforce it”—the Court explained, Congress would be “unable to legislate ‘wisely or effectively.’” Id. (quoting McGrain, 273 U.S. at 174, 175).

Mazars is only the latest in an unbroken line of Supreme Court precedent supporting Congress’s power to enforce its subpoenas. Almost a century ago, in McGrain, the Supreme Court considered whether the Senate and the House had the power to “compel a private individual to appear ... and give testimony.” 273 U.S. at 154. Although McGrain arose in the context of a habeas proceeding, the Supreme Court spoke broadly to Congress’s constitutional right to secure information. As the Court explained, Article I empowers Congress to legislate, and “[a] legislative body cannot legislate wisely or effectively in the absence of information.” Id. at 175.

Because “mere requests for such information often are unavailing, ... some means of compulsion are essential to obtain what is needed.” Id. Accordingly, the Court held, “[t]he power of inquiry—with process to enforce it—is an essential and appropriate auxiliary to the legislative function.” Id. at 174 (emphasis added).

Three decades later, the Supreme Court revisited the question of Congress’s Article I rights of inquiry in Quinn, 349 U.S. 155, a direct criminal appeal involving a private individual. The Court reaffirmed that Congress’s power to investigate—which is “co-extensive with the power to legislate”—encompasses the authority to enforce compliance with subpoenas. Id. at 160. “Without the power to investigate,” the Court stated, “including of course the authority to compel testimony[,] ... Congress could be seriously handicapped in its efforts to exercise its constitutional function wisely and effectively.” Id. at 160-61. Congress could seek that enforcement, and vindicate its constitutional prerogative, the Court explained, “either through its own processes or through judicial trial.” Id. at 161.

McGrain, Quinn, and Mazars stand for a fundamental principle: Article I imbues Congress with the power to compel production of information so that Congress can avoid “shooting in the dark” in fulfilling its legislative and oversight duties. Mazars, 140 S. Ct. at 2031.

2. Given Congress’s well-established constitutional right of inquiry, the Panel could conclude that the House lacked a cause of action only by casting aside an equally venerable line of Supreme Court authority holding that an equitable cause of action is available to remedy unconstitutional conduct, including in cases involving the separation of powers.

In Free Enterprise Fund, for instance, the Supreme Court refused to adopt DOJ’s argument that the plaintiff lacked “an implied private right of action directly under the Constitution to challenge governmental action under ... separation-of-powers principles.” 561 U.S. at 491 n.2. According to the Court, DOJ had provided no reason that a separation-of-powers challenge “should be treated differently than every other constitutional claim,” for which “equitable relief ‘has long been recognized as the proper means for preventing entities from acting unconstitutionally.’” Id. (quoting Corr. Servs. Corp. v. Malesko, 534 U.S. 61, 74 (2001)).

What was true in Free Enterprise Fund is equally true here. “[C]ourts of equity” have “a long history of judicial review of illegal executive action,” and equitable relief is available “in a proper case ... to prevent an injurious act by a public officer.” Armstrong v. Exceptional Child Center, Inc., 575 U.S. 320, 327 (2015) (quoting Carroll v.

Safford, 44 U.S. (3 How.) 441, 463 (1845)); see also Ex Parte Young, 209 U.S. 123, 149 (1908).<sup>2</sup>

The Committee’s information-gathering right has been “handicapped by McGahn’s defiance of the subpoena.” McGahn En Banc Op. at 17-18, A38-39. It follows that the Committee’s claim should be treated no “differently than every other constitutional claim” for equitable relief. See Free Enter. Fund, 561 U.S. at 491 n.2. Indeed, in other cases involving Congressional subpoenas, both this Circuit and the Supreme Court have permitted the Executive Branch and the President to seek equitable relief to vindicate their constitutional prerogatives. See AT&T II, 567 F.2d at 130-31; Mazars, 140 S. Ct. 2019.

3. The House’s right to equitable relief also follows directly from this Court’s en banc decision. There, the Court held that the Executive’s refusal to comply with a valid subpoena not only violates the House’s Article I rights, but also gives rise to a justiciable controversy that warrants “judicial enforcement” where necessary.

McGahn En Banc Op. at 4, A25. Given that the House has suffered that kind of cognizable constitutional injury, it is entitled to sue in equity to remedy that injury under this Court's equitable jurisprudence.

---

<sup>2</sup> Because Congress’s right to compel production of information extends to both private individuals and members of the Executive Branch, see McGahn En Banc Op. at 3-4, A24-25; Quinn, 349 U.S. at 157, 160-61, an equitable remedy extends to both categories of individuals, see Free Enter. Fund, 561 U.S. at 491 n.2 (quoting Bell, 327 U.S. at 684) (it is the Supreme Court’s “established practice” to sustain federal courts’ jurisdiction “to issue injunctions to protect rights safeguarded by the Constitution”).

4. The Panel's contrary holding is wrong. The Panel acknowledges (as it must) that McGrain and Quinn confirmed Congress's broad, constitutional authority to compel compliance with its investigations. McGahn II at 6, A6. But its attempt to restrict these cases to their facts is unfaithful to their text. The Supreme Court meant what it said: The House has authority to use "process to enforce" its power of inquiry, McGrain, 273 U.S. at 174, and that includes "judicial" process, Quinn, 349 U.S. at 160-61.<sup>3</sup> The Panel fails even to mention Mazars, the Supreme Court's most recent teaching on Congress's broad investigatory and enforcement authority.

In a familiar refrain, the Panel argues that history does not support the existence of an equitable cause of action here. McGahn II at 4, A4 (citing Grupo Mexicano de Desarrollo, S.A. v. All. Bond Fund, Inc., 527 U.S. 308, 319 (1999)). But the Panel looks to the wrong history. The relevant precedent is the "long history of judicial review of illegal executive action," which establishes that equitable relief is available "to prevent an injurious act by a public officer." Armstrong, 575 U.S. at 327 (quoting Carroll, 44 U.S. (3 How.) at 463); see Free Enter. Fund, 561 U.S. at 491 & n.2.

---

<sup>3</sup> OLC, in opinions it has never withdrawn, concluded that a House of Congress can file a civil action to seek enforcement of its subpoenas. See Response to Congressional Requests for Information Regarding Decisions Made Under the Independent Counsel Act, 10 Op. O.L.C. 68, 83 (1986); Prosecution for Contempt of Congress of an Executive Branch Official Who Has Asserted a Claim of Executive Privilege, 8 Op. O.L.C. 101, 137 (1984).

There is no reason for equity to be unavailable to Congress to enforce its subpoenas—particularly when the Executive Branch and the President may sue over the same. See Mazars, 140 S. Ct. 2019; AT&T II, 567 F.2d at 122-23, 130-31; cf. Vance, 140 S. Ct. 2412. This case is thus nothing like Grupo Mexicano, where the requested type of relief had been “specifically disclaimed by longstanding judicial precedent.” 527 U.S. at 322.

In focusing on the relative scarcity of pre-1970 suits by Congress, the Panel repeats its error from McGahn I, where it held that the Committee lacked standing because of a historical dearth of such suits. The en banc Court reversed, explaining that judicial enforcement of subpoenas does not rely on a particular judicial pedigree, McGahn En Banc Op. at 34, A55; rather, it “preserves the power of subpoena that the House of Representatives is already understood to possess” under Article I, id. at 23-24, A44-A45. The Panel ignores that lesson, inferring from the same lack of historical suits that the Committee has no cause of action. The “unprecedented categorical direction” by President Trump to refuse accommodation and disregard the House’s Article I authority does not undermine the existence of a cause of action—it is precisely why equitable relief is warranted. See id. at 36, A57

The Panel’s resort to decisions involving implied causes of action for damages fares no better. See McGahn II at 3, A3 (citing Ziglar v. Abbasi, 137 S. Ct. 1843, 1857 (2017); Hernandez v. Mesa, 140 S. Ct. 735, 741-43 (2020)). It makes good sense that courts hesitate to imply causes of action for damages: Those cases “often create substantial costs, in the form of defense and indemnification,” and it is not the courts but Congress that are responsible for deciding whether “monetary and other liabilities should be imposed.” Ziglar, 137 S. Ct. at 1856; see also Hernandez, 140 S. Ct. at 742. As Ziglar recognized, that reasoning does not disturb courts’ well-established equitable powers to enforce the Constitution. 137 S. Ct. at 1856.

The Panel was equally wrong to look to cases concerning implied causes of action for private parties to enforce federal statutes. See McGahn II at 3, A3 (citing, inter alia, Alexander v. Sandoval, 532 U.S. 275 (2001)). A key factor in that analysis is how Congress chose to protect the statutory right in question: through judicial enforcement or by other means, such as agency enforcement. See Sandoval, 532 U.S. at 288-90. That inquiry has no place in considering an equitable cause of action to vindicate constitutional rights.

The Panel also relied on language from Reed v. County Commissioners of Delaware County, 277 U.S. 376 (1928). But that case did not address—or question—whether Congress had a cause of action, and instead concerned only subject-matter jurisdiction. See House Panel Br. 36-37. The Court never doubted that the Senate would have had a cause of action in equity in a case where subject-matter jurisdiction existed.

Finally, the Panel erred by construing specific statutory remedies for Senate subpoena enforcement to block the House from judicial subpoena enforcement. The “implied statutory limitations” the Panel invokes to treat the House as a disfavored litigant—2 U.S.C. § 288d and 28 U.S.C. § 1365, see McGahn II at 3-4, A3-A4—do not “establish Congress’s ‘intent to foreclose’ equitable relief” to the House. Armstrong, 575 U.S. at 327-28 (quoting Verizon Md., Inc. v. Pub. Serv. Comm’n of Md., 535 U.S. 635, 647 (2002)). “[W]here Congress intends to preclude judicial review of constitutional claims[,] its intent to do so must be clear.” Webster v. Doe, 486 U.S. 592, 603 (1988).

Yet the statutes relied on by the Panel have nothing at all to do with House subpoenas. Nor does either provision establish an alternative remedy for the House to address defiance of its subpoenas or set “judicially unadministrable” standards. Armstrong, 575 U.S. at 328-29. As Judge Rogers explained, and other courts have found, these statutes do not meet the high standard required to deny any judicial forum for the House’s constitutional claims. See McGahn II Dis. at 7-10, A16-A19; Comm. on Oversight, 979 F. Supp. 2d at 17-20; Miers, 558 F. Supp. 2d at 86-87, 94.

B. The Panel’s holding that the Committee also could not obtain relief under the Declaratory Judgment Act is equally worthy of review. The Declaratory Judgment Act empowers courts to declare parties’ “rights” and “legal relations” where there is (1) an actual case or controversy, and (2) federal jurisdiction. 28 U.S.C. § 2201(a). Here, both conditions are met: Because the Committee has Article III standing to seek “judicial enforcement of its subpoena,” McGahn En Banc Op. at 29, A50, “[i]t follows that the present dispute is a genuine case or controversy,” McGahn II Dis. at 2, A11. And as this Court held in United States v. AT&T, 551 F.2d 384 (D.C. Cir. 1976) (“AT&T I”), there is federal jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1331 because the enforceability of a House subpoena “arises under the Constitution of the United States.” Id. at 389; see House Panel Br. 27-34. The Declaratory Judgment Act thus provides a solid basis for the Committee to seek a judicial declaration of its right to compliance with its lawful subpoena.

This Act, of course, does not itself create substantive legal rights or “provide a cause of action” where one is otherwise lacking. Ali v. Rumsfeld, 649 F.3d 762, 778 (D.C. Cir. 2011). The Committee has never argued to the contrary. Rather, the Committee invokes the Act to obtain a declaration vindicating its “right, based in the Constitution, to have McGahn appear to testify.” McGahn En Banc Op. at 13, A34. As Judge Rogers explained, equity entitles the Committee to an injunction to protect its constitutional right to secure McGahn’s testimony, and the Declaratory Judgment Act entitles the Committee to a declaration of that right. McGahn II Dis. at 2-5, A11-A14.

II. THE PANEL’S DECISION WILL IMPEDE CONGRESSIONAL INVESTIGATIONS AND OVERSIGHT.

As the Supreme Court reaffirmed in Mazars, each House of Congress has constitutional “power ‘to secure needed information’ in order to legislate.” 140 S. Ct. at 2031 (quoting McGrain, 273 U.S. at 161). This power of investigation “comprehends probes into departments of the Federal Government to expose corruption, inefficiency or waste.” Watkins, 354 U.S. at 187. But the House cannot meaningfully exercise its Article I power to conduct oversight and investigate Executive Branch corruption and misconduct, to effectively legislate in those areas, or to consider impeachment if the House cannot enforce its subpoenas against the Executive Branch. See generally Quinn, 349 U.S. at 160-61. Without even the possibility of judicial enforcement, Presidents will have no incentive to cooperate and every incentive to “direct widescale noncompliance with lawful Congressional inquiries, secure in the knowledge that Congress can do little to enforce a subpoena short of directing a Sergeant at Arms to physically arrest an Executive Branch officer.” McGahn I, 951 F.3d at 555 (Rogers, J., dissenting). No less than the prior Panel decision, the current decision runs roughshod over core separation-of-power principles.

It is no answer for the Panel to suggest that “Congress (rather than a single committee in a single chamber thereof)” is “free to enact a statute that makes the House’s requests for information judicially enforceable.” McGahn II at 8, A8. Legislation is unnecessary to secure the availability of traditional equitable relief. What is more, the Panel’s proposal for bicameral legislation ignores that both Houses of Congress stand “on the same plane” in their power to investigate and enforce compliance; each House has independent “power, through its own process, to compel” testimony. McGrain, 273 U.S. at 154. Demanding that the Senate agree to pass and the President agree to sign legislation vindicating the constitutional prerogatives of the House disrespects the Constitutional order. By closing the courthouse doors, the Panel denies the House’s independent “constitutionally grounded entitlement to obtain information.” McGahn En Banc Op. at 14, A35.

III. THE EN BANC COURT SHOULD RESOLVE THE REMAINING ISSUES IN THIS MATTER.

This Court should resolve the remaining two issues—statutory subject-matter jurisdiction and absolute immunity—as part of the en banc proceeding. Both issues have been fully briefed and are ripe for adjudication. The House served this subpoena more than 16 months ago. Both judicial economy and the administration of justice demand the resolution of the appeal in toto.

With respect to statutory subject-matter jurisdiction, en banc consideration is appropriate because jurisdiction is a predicate issue, fully addressed by the parties’ briefing on appeal. As Judge Rogers recognized, and multiple courts have held, actions involving House subpoenas present a federal question under 28 U.S.C. § 1331, whose scope was not impliedly narrowed by § 1365. See McGahn II Dis. at 7-10, A16-A19; Comm. on Oversight, 979 F. Supp. 2d at 17; Miers, 558 F. Supp. 2d at 64-65; JA909-13; cf. AT&T I, 551 F.2d at 388-89.

This Court should also address en banc the sole merits issue in this case: whether McGahn is absolutely immune from the Committee’s subpoena. The assertion is baseless. As the Committee has explained, McGahn’s theory of absolute immunity is pure invention by the Executive Branch and “rests upon an archaic view of the separation of powers as requiring three airtight departments of government.” Nixon v. Adm’r of Gen. Servs., 433 U.S. 425, 443 (1977) (quotation marks omitted). No court has ever accepted the theory, and two judges of the Panel rejected it. McGahn I, 951 F.3d at 531-32 (Henderson, J., concurring); McGahn II Dis. at 10, A19 (Rogers, J.).

The en banc Court should confirm that this theory has no place in our system of checks and balances.

CONCLUSION

The Court should promptly grant rehearing en banc.

Respectfully submitted,

/s/ Douglas N. Letter

Matthew S. Hellman
Elizabeth B. Deutsch
JENNER & BLOCK LLP
1099 New York Avenue NW
Washington, D.C. 20001
(202) 639-6000

Annie L. Owens
Joshua A. Geltzer
Seth Wayne
INSTITUTE FOR CONSTITUTIONAL
ADVOCACY AND PROTECTION
Georgetown University Law Center
600 New Jersey Avenue NW
Washington, D.C. 20001
(202) 662-9042

Douglas N. Letter
General Counsel
Todd B. Tatelman
Megan Barbero
Josephine Morse
Adam A. Grogg
William E. Havemann
Lisa K. Helvin
Jonathan B. Schwartz
OFFICE OF GENERAL COUNSEL
U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
219 Cannon House Office Building
Washington, D.C. 20515
(202) 225-9700
douglas.letter@mail.house.gov

Counsel for Appellee

CERTIFICATE OF COMPLIANCE

1. This brief complies with Federal Rule of Appellate Procedure 35(b)(2)(A) because it contains 3,896 words.

2. This brief complies with the typeface requirements of Fed. R. App. P. 32(a)(5) and the type style requirements of Fed. R. App. P. 32(a)(6) because this brief has been prepared in a proportionally spaced typeface using Microsoft Word Professional Plus 2016 in 14-point Garamond type.

/s/ Douglas N. Letter
Douglas N. Letter

CERTIFICATE OF SERVICE

I certify that on September 8, 2020, I filed the foregoing Petition for Rehearing En Banc of the Committee on the Judiciary of the U.S. House of Representatives via the CM/ECF system of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, which I understand caused service on all registered parties.

/s/ Douglas N. Letter
Douglas N. Letter

ADDENDUM

ADDENDUM TABLE OF CONTENTS

Committee on the Judiciary v. McGahn, No. 19-5331, 2020 WL 5104869 (D.C. Cir. Aug. 31, 2020) ..... A1

Committee on the Judiciary v. McGahn, 968 F.3d 755 (D.C. Cir. 2020) (en banc)..... A22

United States Court of Appeals
FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA CIRCUIT

---

Decided August 31, 2020

No. 19-5331

COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY OF THE UNITED STATES HOUSE
OF REPRESENTATIVES,
APPELLEE

v.

DONALD F. MCGAHN, II,
APPELLANT

---

Appeal from the United States District Court for the District of Columbia
(No. 1:19-cv-02379)

---

Hashim M. Mooppan, Deputy Assistant Attorney General, U.S. Department of Justice, and Mark R. Freeman, Michael S. Raab, and Martin Totaro, Attorneys, were on the briefs for appellant.

Douglas N. Letter, General Counsel, U.S. House of Representatives, Todd B. Tatelman, Deputy General Counsel, Megan Barbero and Josephine Morse, Associate General Counsel, Adam A. Grogg and William E. Havemann, Assistant General Counsel, Jonathan B. Schwartz, Attorney, and Annie L. Owens were on the brief for appellee.

2

Steven A. Hirsch, Justin Florence, Jamila G. Benkato, and Cameron O. Kistler were on the brief for amici curiae Republican Legal Experts, et al. in support of plaintiff-appellee.

Before: HENDERSON, ROGERS, and GRIFFITH, Circuit Judges.

Opinion for the Court filed by Circuit Judge GRIFFITH.

Dissenting opinion filed by Circuit Judge ROGERS.

GRIFFITH, Circuit Judge: In Committee on the Judiciary v. McGahn, 2020 WL 4556761 (Aug. 7, 2020), the en banc court held that the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives has Article III standing to seek judicial enforcement of a subpoena issued to former White House Counsel Donald F. McGahn, II. Id. at *15. It remanded the case to this three-judge panel to consider the remaining issues, including whether the Committee has a cause of action to enforce its subpoena and, if so, whether McGahn must testify despite the Executive Branch's assertion of absolute testimonial immunity. Id. We have no occasion to address the immunity argument because we conclude that the Committee lacks a cause of action. Accordingly, the case must be dismissed.

I

The en banc court held that the Committee has Article III standing, but the Committee “also need[s] a cause of action to prosecute” its case in federal court. Make the Road N.Y. v. Wolf, 962 F.3d 612, 631 (D.C. Cir. 2020). Here, the Committee argues that it has an implied cause of action under Article I, that it can invoke the traditional power of courts of equity to enjoin unlawful executive action, and that the Declaratory Judgment Act provides a separate basis for this suit. We disagree.

3

A

Start with Article I. The Committee argues that it is “entitled under Article I to seek equitable relief to enforce a subpoena . . . issued in furtherance of its constitutional power of inquiry.” Committee Panel Br. 34 (internal quotation marks omitted). But time and again, the Supreme Court has warned federal courts to hesitate before finding implied causes of action—whether in a congressional statute or in the Constitution. See, e.g., Comcast Corp. v. Nat’l Ass’n of African Am.-Owned Media, 140 S. Ct. 1009, 1015 (2020); Hernandez v. Mesa, 140 S. Ct. 735, 741-43 (2020); Jesner v. Arab Bank, PLC, 138 S. Ct. 1386, 1402 (2018); Ziglar v. Abbasi, 137 S. Ct. 1843, 1857 (2017); Alexander v. Sandoval, 532 U.S. 275, 286-87 (2001). “When a party seeks to assert an implied cause of action under the Constitution itself, . . . separation-of-powers principles are or should be central to the analysis,” and usually Congress “should decide” whether to authorize a lawsuit. Ziglar, 137 S. Ct. at 1857 (internal quotation marks omitted).

In this case, Congress has declined to authorize lawsuits like the Committee’s twice over. First, Congress has granted an express cause of action to the Senate—but not to the House. See 2 U.S.C. § 288d; 28 U.S.C. § 1365(b). Second, the Senate statute expressly excludes suits that involve executive-branch assertions of “governmental privilege.” 28 U.S.C. § 1365(a). The expression of one thing implies the exclusion of the other, and authorizing the Committee to bring its lawsuit would conflict with two separate statutory limitations on civil suits to enforce congressional subpoenas. When determining whether to “recognize any causes of action not expressly created by Congress,” “our watchword is caution,” Hernandez, 140 S. Ct. at 742, and we should not ignore Congress’s carefully drafted limitations on its authority to sue to enforce a subpoena.

The Committee next suggests that—even if Article I alone doesn’t provide a cause of action—the court may exercise its “traditional equitable powers” to grant relief. Ziglar, 137 S. Ct. at 1856. But even those equitable powers remain “subject to express and implied statutory limitations,” Armstrong v. Exceptional Child Ctr., Inc., 575 U.S. 320, 327 (2015), and are further limited to relief that was “traditionally accorded by courts of equity,” Grupo Mexicano de Desarrollo S.A. v. All. Bond Fund, Inc., 527 U.S. 308, 319 (1999). Again, “implied statutory limitations” foreclose suits by the House and suits that implicate a governmental privilege; this one checks both boxes, so Congress itself has precluded us from granting the requested relief to the Committee.

In any event, there is also nothing “traditional” about the Committee’s claim. The Committee cannot point to a single example in which a chamber of Congress brought suit for injunctive relief against the Executive Branch prior to the 1970s. True enough, the en banc court rejected McGahn’s argument that “federal courts have not historically entertained congressional subpoena enforcement lawsuits,” but the full court also recognized the “relative recency” of lawsuits to enforce subpoenas. McGahn, 2020 WL 4556761, at *14. When determining the scope of our equitable authority, however, “relatively recent” history isn’t enough. In Grupo Mexicano, the Supreme Court explained that we “must ask whether the relief” that the Committee requests “was traditionally accorded by courts of equity.” 527 U.S. at 319 (emphasis added). The relief requested here—an injunction issued against a former Executive Branch official in an interbranch information dispute—cannot possibly have been traditionally available in courts of equity, because the “separate systems of law and equity” in our federal system ceased to exist in 1938. SCA Hygiene Prods. Aktiebolag v. First Quality Baby Prods., LLC, 137 S. Ct. 954, 960 (2017). The Committee’s smattering of examples from the 1970s comes (at least) thirty years too late.

Confining ourselves “within the broad boundaries of traditional equitable relief” constrains federal courts to their proper role in a democratic system. Grupo Mexicano, 527 U.S. at 322. We cannot simply gesture towards the “flexibility” of equity and offer whatever relief (in our view) seems necessary to redress an alleged harm; that would transform equity’s “flexibility” into “omnipotence.” Id. Congress may someday determine that the federal courts should stand ready to enforce legislative subpoenas against executive-branch officials, but authorizing that remedy ourselves would be “incompatible with the democratic and self-deprecating judgment” that we lack the “power to create remedies previously unknown to equity jurisprudence.” Id. at 332. “The debate concerning [the] formidable power” to compel executive-branch officials to respond to congressional subpoenas “should be conducted and resolved where such issues belong in our democracy: in the Congress.” Id. at 333.

Finally, the Committee claims that the Declaratory Judgment Act allows it to bring suit. See 28 U.S.C. § 2201(a). This argument is even less persuasive. The Declaratory Judgment Act does not itself “provide a cause of action,” as the “availability of declaratory relief presupposes the existence of a judicially remediable right.” Ali v. Rumsfeld, 649 F.3d 762, 778 (D.C. Cir. 2011) (cleaned up); see also C&E Servs., Inc. of Wash. v. D.C. Water & Sewer Auth., 310 F.3d 197, 201 (D.C. Cir. 2002). That statute is “procedural only” and simply “enlarge[s] the range of remedies available in the federal courts.” Skelly Oil Co. v. Phillips Petroleum Co., 339 U.S. 667,

6

671 (1950) (internal quotation marks omitted). Because Article I does not create a “judicially remediable right” to enforce a congressional subpoena, the Committee cannot use the Declaratory Judgment Act to bootstrap its way into federal court. Thus, even though the Committee has the Article III standing necessary to “get[] [it] through the courthouse door, [that] does not keep [it] there.” Make the Road, 962 F.3d at 631.

B

The dissent’s contrary arguments fail. First, the dissent suggests that the court may infer a cause of action from the Committee’s Article I power to issue subpoenas. Dissent at 1-2. The dissent quotes McGrain v. Daugherty, which held that the “power of inquiry—with process to enforce it—is an essential and appropriate auxiliary to the legislative function.” 273 U.S. 135, 174 (1927); see also Quinn v. United States, 349 U.S. 155, 160-61 (1955) (similar). But the Supreme Court has also explained that “[a]uthority to exert the powers of the [House] to compel production of evidence differs widely from authority to invoke judicial power to that purpose.” Reed v. Cty. Comm’rs of Del. Cty., 277 U.S. 376, 389 (1928) (emphasis added). And neither of the cases that the dissent cites says that Article I gives the Committee power to file a civil suit to enforce its subpoenas. McGrain arose out of a habeas corpus suit filed after the Senate exercised its inherent contempt power to arrest the Attorney General’s brother. See McGrain, 273 U.S. at 153-54. And although Quinn stated that Congress has “the authority to compel testimony” through “its own processes” or a “judicial trial,” that case arose out of a criminal conviction for contempt of Congress—a violation of a criminal statute. 349 U.S. at 160-61. These cases do not demonstrate that Article I creates a cause of action for the Committee. To the contrary, they show that Congress has long relied on its own devices—either its inherent contempt power, see, e.g.,

7

Anderson v. Dunn, 19 U.S. (6 Wheat.) 204 (1821), or the criminal contempt statute enacted in 1857, see McGrain, 273 U.S. at 167.

Our circuit has already recognized these limits on Congress's power to enforce subpoenas. As we explained, "Prior to 1978 Congress had only two means of enforcing compliance with its subpoenas: [1] a statutory criminal contempt mechanism and [2] the inherent congressional contempt power." In re U.S. Senate Permanent Subcomm. on Investigations, 655 F.2d 1232, 1238 (D.C. Cir. 1981) (emphasis added) (footnote omitted). Although Congress "[r]espond[ed] to this deficiency" by enacting a "mechanism for civil enforcement of Senate subpoenas" in 1978, that statute "does not . . . include civil enforcement of subpoenas by the House of Representatives." Id. at 1238 & n.28 (emphasis added). Our precedent thus plainly presupposes that the Constitution alone does not provide a cause of action.

The dissent's reliance on the Declaratory Judgment Act also fails. The dissent concedes that the Act "presupposes the existence of a judicially remediable right." Dissent at 3 (quoting C&E Servs., 310 F.3d at 201). The dissent locates this "judicially remediable right" in Article I, but as explained above, Congress has no implied constitutional power to seek civil enforcement of its subpoenas. The Committee thus cannot identify an underlying judicial remedy that could authorize it to invoke the Declaratory Judgment Act.

II

Because the Committee lacks a cause of action to enforce its subpoena, this lawsuit must be dismissed. We note that this decision does not preclude Congress (or one of its chambers) from ever enforcing a subpoena in federal court; it simply precludes it from doing so without first enacting a statute authorizing such a suit. The Constitution’s Necessary and Proper Clause vests Congress with power to “make all Laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into Execution” its constitutional powers, and that Clause gives Congress—and certainly not the federal courts—the broad discretion to structure the national government through the legislative process. U.S. CONST. art. I, § 8, cl. 18.

If Congress (rather than a single committee in a single chamber thereof) determines that its current mechanisms leave it unable to adequately enforce its subpoenas, it remains free to enact a statute that makes the House’s requests for information judicially enforceable. Indeed, Congress has passed similar statutes before, authorizing criminal enforcement in 1857 and civil enforcement for the Senate in 1978. See Senate Permanent Subcomm., 655 F.3d at 1238 & n.26. Because no “legislation pursues its purposes at all costs,” CTS Corp. v. Waldburger, 573 U.S. 1, 12 (2014) (internal quotation marks omitted), any such statute might, for example, carve out certain categories of subpoenas, or create unique procedural protections for defendants. That’s exactly what Congress has done in the past. The 1857 statute, for instance, stated that “no person examined and testifying” before Congress “shall be held to answer criminally . . . for any fact or act [about] which he shall be required to testify.” In re Chapman, 166 U.S. 661, 665 n.1 (1897). And the Senate’s civil enforcement statute exempts from suit any defendant asserting a “governmental privilege.” 28 U.S.C. § 1365(a).

Balancing the various policy considerations in crafting an enforcement statute is a legislative judgment. For that reason, the Constitution leaves to Congress—and not to the federal courts—the authority to craft rights and remedies in our constitutional democracy. Perhaps “new conditions” “might call for a wrenching departure from past practice” and for a new statute allowing the House to leverage the power of federal courts to compel testimony or the production of documents. Grupo Mexicano, 527 U.S. at 322. But if any institution is well-positioned to “perceive” those new conditions, to assess Congress’s needs, to balance those needs against the countervailing policy considerations, and then “to design the appropriate remedy,” that institution is Congress. Id.

9

The judgment of the district court is reversed, and the case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

So ordered.

ROGERS, Circuit Judge, dissenting: In Committee on the Judiciary v. McGahn, 2020 WL 4556761 (Aug. 7, 2020), the en banc court held that a Committee of the House of Representatives has Article III standing to seek judicial enforcement of a subpoena duly issued to former White House Counsel Donald F. McGahn, II. Id. at *15. It remanded to the panel initially assigned to hear the case the remaining issues, including the jurisdictional issues the court considers today. Id. For the following reasons, the Committee has a cause of action to litigate its subpoena enforcement lawsuit in federal court and the court has statutory subject matter jurisdiction to resolve it. Further, on the merits, McGahn’s contention that he is entitled to absolute immunity from the Committee’s subpoena lacks merit.

I.

McGahn contends that, notwithstanding the Committee’s Article III standing, see generally McGahn, 2020 WL 4556761, there is no statutory or constitutional authorization for the Committee to bring the present subpoena enforcement lawsuit. But there is both an implied cause of action under Article I of the Constitution and a cause of action pursuant to the Declaratory Judgment Act authorizing the Committee to bring this lawsuit.

A.

In McGrain v. Daugherty, 273 U.S. 135 (1927), the Supreme Court indicated that the Constitution implies a right of action to enforce a subpoena. In that case, the Supreme Court stated that “the power of inquiry — with process to enforce it — is an essential and appropriate auxiliary to the legislative function.” Id. at 174; see McGahn, 2020 WL 4556761, at *4–5. The Court inferred from Article I not only the power of a House of Congress to demand testimony and information but also “process to enforce” such a demand, namely a subpoena enforcement lawsuit. Similarly, the Supreme Court stated in Quinn v. United States, 349 U.S. 155 (1955), that a subpoena gives Congress “the authority to compel testimony, either through its own processes or through judicial trial,” id. at 160–61, indicating that the subpoena power encompasses the authority to enforce a subpoena in federal court. In sum, the Supreme Court has explained that the powers of Congress enumerated in Article I of the Constitution imply not only a right to information but also a right to seek judicial enforcement of its subpoena.

B.

Even if an implied cause of action under the Constitution were inadequate, the Declaratory Judgment Act provides a cause of action for Congress to enforce its subpoena. The Act authorizes the court to “declare the rights and other legal relations of any interested party seeking such declaration, whether or not further relief is or could be sought,” so long as there is “a case of actual controversy” over which a federal court may exercise jurisdiction. 28 U.S.C. § 2201(a). Those two requirements — (1) an actual case or controversy, and (2) federal court jurisdiction — are met here. First, the en banc court has held that the Committee has Article III standing. See generally McGahn, 2020 WL 4556761. It follows that the present dispute is a genuine case or controversy. Second, 28 U.S.C. § 1331 supplies federal jurisdiction over this lawsuit, as explained in Part II infra. The statutory requirements for proceeding under the Declaratory Judgment Act are thus met. Under the plain text of the Act, nothing else is required. In particular, “the wording of the statute does not indicate that any independent cause of action is required to invoke” the Declaratory Judgment Act, Comm. on the Judiciary v. Miers, 558 F. Supp. 2d 53, 80 (D.D.C. 2008), and the Supreme Court, although emphasizing that the Act is not a source of federal court jurisdiction or any substantive rights, has never stated that it does not create a right of action.

The various limits that the Supreme Court and this court have placed upon lawsuits brought under the Declaratory Judgment Act do not preclude the House of Representatives from proceeding under the Act. First, the Supreme Court has emphasized that the Declaratory Judgment Act does not provide an independent source of federal jurisdiction. In Skelly Oil Co. v. Phillips Petroleum Co., 339 U.S. 667, 671 (1950), the Court stated that the Declaratory Judgment Act “enlarged the range of remedies available in the federal courts but did not extend their jurisdiction.” Id. In that case, plaintiffs filed suit pursuant to the Declaratory Judgment Act seeking an interpretation by the federal court of a contract provision, a question solely of state law. Id. at 672. The Court decided that the mere fact that the plaintiffs had proceeded under the Act did not suffice to render the case’s state contract law issue a federal question for purposes of § 1331. See id. at 671–72. The proscription of Skelly Oil is no obstacle to the Committee here because the court has jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1331, see Part II infra. Thus, the Committee does not impermissibly seek to rely on the Act as a source of federal court jurisdiction.

Second, the Declaratory Judgment Act “presupposes the existence of a judicially remediable right.” C&E Servs., Inc. v. D.C. Water & Sewer Auth., 310 F.3d 197, 201 (D.C. Cir. 2002) (quoting Schilling v. Rogers, 363 U.S. 666, 677 (1960)). In C&E Services, the issue was whether the appellant could obtain a declaratory judgment that, in structuring its bidding process, the D.C. Water & Sewer Authority had violated the federal Service Contract Act. The court held that it could not, because the Service Contract Act required any dispute arising under it to be resolved by the U.S. Secretary of Labor; the Declaratory Judgment Act was not an avenue to circumvent that statutory requirement. See id. at 202. Citing Schilling v. Rogers, 363 U.S. 666 (1960), the court stated that “federal courts may not declare a plaintiff’s rights under a federal statute that Congress intended to be enforced exclusively through a judicially unreviewable administrative hearing.” Id. at 201. That makes C&E Services quite different because the Committee is suing in the context of its constitutional duty of impeachment to enforce a right to compulsory process that follows from the Constitution, not a statute. Furthermore, because the Committee does not assert a statutory right, there is no statutorily mandated exclusive remedial scheme for vindication of that right, as there was in C&E Services.

More broadly, C&E Services and Schilling stand for the proposition that the Declaratory Judgment Act provides no substantive right that a plaintiff may seek to adjudicate in federal court. Rather, the Act is a vehicle for vindicating a separate and independent substantive right. The Constitution itself is the source of the right of compulsory process that the Committee seeks to vindicate here; the Supreme Court has long recognized Congress’s broad power of inquiry and the concomitant right to compel witnesses to appear before it. See, e.g., McGrain, 273 U.S. at 174; see McGahn, 2020 WL 4556761, at *4–5. Thus, because the Committee asserts a right to have McGahn appear before it to testify, and because this court has held that a dispute over that right is susceptible of judicial resolution, see McGahn, 2020 WL 4556761, at *15, the requirement that a Declaratory Judgment Act plaintiff rely on an independent judicially remediable substantive right is satisfied.

McGahn points out that this court has stated: “Nor does the Declaratory Judgment Act . . . provide a cause of action.” Ali v. Rumsfeld, 649 F.3d 762, 778 (D.C. Cir. 2011) (citation omitted). That statement was made in the context of unique factual circumstances very different from the present case. In Ali, the appellants were Afghan and Iraqi citizens detained in their home countries in the course of U.S. military operations there. See id. at 764–65. Their lawsuit sought, among other things, a declaratory judgment that their treatment in detention violated the law of nations, treaties to which the United States was a party, and the Fifth and Eighth Amendments of the U.S. Constitution. Id. The court held that the Declaratory Judgment Act did not provide the plaintiffs with a cause of action, see id. at 778, casting doubt that the Fifth and Eighth Amendments protected them because they were detained overseas in a country over which the United States did not exercise “de facto sovereignty,” id. at 772 (citing Boumediene v. Bush, 553 U.S. 723, 755 (2008)). The court stated: “[W]e have . . . held that the Suspension Clause does not apply to Bagram detainees. [Appellants] offer no reason — and we see none ourselves — why their Fifth and Eighth Amendment claims would be any stronger than the Suspension Clause claims of the Bagram detainees.” Id. The clear implication of that reasoning is that the Fifth and Eighth Amendments did not apply to the Ali plaintiffs, and thus that no constitutional right was at stake.

No party disputes the existence of the constitutional power — namely, the power of inquiry — that the House seeks to vindicate. See McGrain, 273 U.S. at 174. The defect in Ali, then, was akin to the problem of C&E Services, namely that there was no substantive right that plaintiffs could assert. So understood, Ali does not prevent the House from proceeding under the Declaratory Judgment Act here to vindicate an established constitutional right.

6

II.

It is not enough that the Committee have Article III standing and a cause of action to bring the present lawsuit; the court must also assure itself that it has statutory subject matter jurisdiction to resolve the dispute. Contrary to McGahn's position, the court has subject matter jurisdiction over the Committee's lawsuit pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1331, which grants statutory jurisdiction over "all civil actions arising under the Constitution . . . of the United States." The present lawsuit "aris[es] under the Constitution" and is therefore within the court's jurisdiction.

The power that the Committee seeks to exercise in the present lawsuit flows from the Constitution. "Because Congress must have access to information to perform its constitutional responsibilities, when Congress 'does not itself possess the requisite information — which not infrequently is true — recourse must be had to others who do possess it.'" McGahn, 2020 WL 4556761, at *4 (quoting McGrain, 273 U.S. at 175). Consequently, "the Supreme Court has acknowledged the essentiality of information to the effective functioning of Congress and long 'held that each House has power to secure needed information' through the subpoena power." Id. (quoting Trump v. Mazars USA, LLP, 140 S. Ct. 2019, 2031 (2020)) (internal quotation marks omitted). "That constitutional power entitles each House to the testimony of a witness and production of requested documents in response to a lawful subpoena." Id. Because the House seeks through the present lawsuit to exercise its subpoena power, and because that power flows from Article I of the Constitution, see, e.g., McGrain, 273 U.S. at 174, the Committee's lawsuit arises under the Constitution. The court therefore has subject matter jurisdiction pursuant to § 1331.

This conclusion is bolstered by United States v. AT&T, 551 F.2d 384 (D.C. Cir. 1976). In that case, the Executive Branch sued AT&T to enjoin its compliance with a congressional subpoena. The President had directed AT&T “as an agent of the United States, to respectfully decline to comply with the Committee subpoena.” Id. at 387 (citation omitted). The House of Representatives intervened as a defendant to represent its interest in AT&T’s compliance with the Committee subpoena. After observing that the subpoena dispute presented “a clash of the powers of the legislative and executive branches,” this court held that subject matter “[j]urisdiction exists under 28 U.S.C. § 1331,” as explained in Part II. Id. at 389. The court reasoned that because the question before it was whether the Executive Branch possessed the “constitutional powers” to “prevent transmission of [requested information] to Congress” pursuant to a congressional subpoena, “[t]he action therefore arises under the Constitution of the United States.” Id. AT&T thus establishes that a dispute over whether a party must comply with a congressional subpoena arises under the Constitution and therefore lies within § 1331’s grant of subject matter jurisdiction.

McGahn responds that notwithstanding the plain text of § 1331 and this court’s precedent interpreting that provision to provide subject matter jurisdiction over a dispute concerning a congressional subpoena, 28 U.S.C. § 1365 has impliedly repealed federal jurisdiction granted by § 1331. That argument, which the majority embraces, is unpersuasive.

Section 1365, entitled “Senate actions,” confers on the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia original jurisdiction “over any civil action brought by the Senate or any authorized committee or subcommittee . . . to enforce, to secure a declaratory judgment concerning the validity of, or to prevent a threatened refusal or failure to comply with, any subpoena or order issued by the Senate or committee or subcommittee.” 28 U.S.C. § 1365. On its face, § 1365 says nothing about subpoena enforcement lawsuits brought by the House of Representatives. Yet by explicitly granting the federal courts jurisdiction over a Senate subpoena enforcement action but not a House subpoena enforcement action, McGahn maintains that Congress intended that the federal courts should not have jurisdiction over the latter. This argument fails on two grounds. First, it overlooks the key context. When Congress enacted § 1365 in 1978, § 1331 contained an amount-in-controversy requirement for lawsuits against private parties and officials acting in their individual capacities. The Senate had good reason to believe that this requirement would be an obstacle to subpoena-enforcement lawsuits because the district court in Senate Select Committee on Presidential Campaign Activities v. Nixon, 366 F. Supp. 51 (D.D.C. 1973), had originally dismissed the Senate’s lawsuit for failure to meet the requirement, see id. at 59–61. Congress addressed this problem in 1978 with the enactment of § 1365, which granted federal courts subject matter jurisdiction over Senate subpoena-enforcement actions without regard to the amount in controversy. The Senate Committee on Governmental Affairs explicitly disclaimed the inference that McGahn now seeks to draw, stating in its report on § 1365 that the provision “is not intended to be a Congressional finding that the Federal courts do not now have the authority to hear a civil action to enforce a subp[o]ena against an officer or employee of the Federal Government.” S. REP. NO. 95-170, at 91–92 (1978).

Congress is free to address problems seriatim without thereby implicating questions not before it. As the Supreme Court has explained, “reform may take one step at a time, addressing itself to the phase of the problem which seems most acute to the legislative mind. The legislature may select one phase of one field and apply a remedy there, neglecting the others.” Williamson v. Lee Optical, 348 U.S. 483, 489 (1955) (citation omitted)). With § 1365, Congress was responding to a particular problem: the amount in controversy requirement that, until it was eliminated in 1980, prevented federal courts from exercising jurisdiction over Congressional subpoena-enforcement suits under § 1331. Given the specific obstacle Congress overcame in enacting § 1365, there is no basis to conclude the statute bears on federal jurisdiction over House subpoena-enforcement actions. The inference that § 1365 has repealed such jurisdiction is therefore unwarranted.

Second, the Supreme Court has cautioned against the implied repeal argument that McGahn advances. Because “[r]edundancies across statutes are not unusual events in drafting, . . . so long as there is no ‘positive repugnancy’ between two laws, a court must give effect to both.” Conn. Nat’l Bank v. Germain, 503 U.S. 249, 253 (1992) (quoting Wood v. United States, 41 U.S. (16 Pet.) 342, 363 (1842)). Consequently, “jurisdiction conferred by 28 U.S.C. § 1331 should hold firm against ‘mere implication flowing from subsequent litigation.’” Mims v. Arrow Fin. Servs., LLC, 565 U.S. 368, 383 (2012) (quoting Colo. River Water Conservation Dist. v. United States, 424 U.S. 800, 808 (1976)). That admonition counsels against McGahn’s and the majority’s theory of the effect that § 1365 has on the court’s jurisdiction over the present lawsuit.

To the extent that legislative history may shed light on the meaning of § 1365 as McGahn urges, reliance on two Senators’ statements during Floor debate on the bill is misplaced. Two Senators stated that § 1365 indicates there is no federal jurisdiction over a Congressional subpoena-enforcement suit unless specifically authorized and reflects a Congressional judgment courts should refrain from exercising jurisdiction over such disputes. Given the jealousy with which each House of Congress guards its constitutional prerogatives, these statements are hardly a clear instruction concerning the effect of § 1365 on the institutional powers of the House of Representatives. It would therefore be inappropriate, in the absence of a clear statutory directive, to conclude that § 1365 also restricted the power of the House to file a federal subpoena-enforcement lawsuit.

10

III.

On the merits, McGahn's contention that he is absolutely immune from the Committee's subpoena must fail. His claim of absolute immunity amounts to the position that the President has the exclusive prerogative to determine what information, if any, will be disclosed in response to a subpoena. Precedent forecloses that position.

In United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683 (1974), the Supreme Court rejected this capacious view of Presidential power over Executive Branch information. Stating that "neither the doctrine of separation of powers, nor the need for confidentiality of high-level communications, without more, can sustain an absolute, unqualified Presidential privilege of immunity from judicial process under all circumstances," the Court instead held that the President possesses a qualified executive privilege whereby Presidential communications are presumptively privileged but whose disclosure may be compelled in the case of demonstrated specific need in a criminal proceeding. Id. at 706–07. As the en banc court recently recognized, this "potentially available privilege is a powerful protection of the President's interest in Executive Branch confidentiality" in the present case. McGahn, 2020 WL 4556761, at *11.

The Supreme Court elaborated on the President's qualified power to screen Executive Branch materials from disclosure in Nixon v. Administrator of General Services, 433 U.S. 425 (1977), concerning not a judicial subpoena in a criminal matter but rather a statute regulating the preservation of President Nixon's Presidential papers. The Court reiterated that although the context was different, the executive privilege was "a qualified one" and that "there has never been an expectation that the confidences of the Executive Office are absolute and unyielding." Id. at 446, 450. The privilege is similarly qualified when asserted in civil litigation. See Dellums v. Powell, 561 F.2d 242, 245–46 (D.C. Cir. 1977).

This court has rejected the claim of absolute presidential privilege in the factual circumstances of the present case, namely in response to a congressional subpoena. In Senate Select Committee on Presidential Campaign Activities v. Nixon, 498 F.2d 725 (D.C. Cir. 1974), the court considered a subpoena enforcement lawsuit brought by a Senate Committee. Rather than indulge the President's claim of absolute privilege in response to the subpoena, the court stated that the proper analysis was to determine whether the Committee's demonstrated "public need" was sufficient to overcome the President's general interest in confidentiality; if so, in camera review of the requested materials by the district court would follow in order to assess the Executive Branch's particularized claims of privilege. Id. at 729–31. The court explained that "[s]o long as the presumption that the public interest favors confidentiality can be defeated only by a strong showing of need by another institution of government . . . the effective functioning of the presidential office will not be impaired." Id. at 730.

This precedent demonstrates that although the President's communications with close advisors, including the White House Counsel, are presumptively privileged, the President does not have absolute, unreviewable discretion to determine what information will be disclosed in response to a subpoena — whether a judicial subpoena in a criminal proceeding or a valid congressional subpoena. Yet that is exactly the nature of McGahn’s absolute immunity claim. By asserting that he need not even appear in response to the Committee’s duly issued subpoena, he in essence contends that the President may unilaterally determine that no information will be disclosed in response to the subpoena. He thereby seeks to revive a view of Presidential power expressly rejected by the Supreme Court.

Accordingly, the judgment of the district court should be affirmed, see Comm. on the Judiciary, U.S. House of Representatives v. McGahn, 415 F. Supp. 3d 148 (D.D.C. 2019), and I respectfully dissent.

United States Court of Appeals
FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA CIRCUIT

---

Argued April 28, 2020

Decided August 7, 2020

No. 19-5331

COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY OF THE UNITED STATES HOUSE
OF REPRESENTATIVES,
APPELLEE

v.

DONALD F. MCGAHN, II,
APPELLANT

---

On Petition for Rehearing En Banc

---

Hashim M. Mooppan, Deputy Assistant Attorney General, U.S. Department of Justice, argued the cause for appellant. With him on the brief were Mark R. Freeman and Michael S. Raab, Attorneys.

Douglas N. Letter, General Counsel, and Megan Barbero, Deputy General Counsel, U.S. House of Representatives, argued the cause for appellee. With them on the brief were Todd B. Tatelman, Principal Deputy General Counsel, Josephine Morse, Deputy General Counsel, Adam A. Grogg and William E. Havemann, Associate General Counsel, Jonathan B. Schwartz, Attorney, Annie L. Owens, Joshua A. Geltzer, and Matthew S. Hellman.

2

Elizabeth B. Wydra, Brianne J. Gorod, and Ashwin P. Phatak were on the brief for amici curiae Former Department of Justice Officials in support of appellee.

Irvin B. Nathan, John A. Freedman, Andrew T. Tutt, and Samuel F. Callahan were on the brief for amici curiae Former Members of Congress in support of appellee.

Andrew D. Herman was on the brief for amici curiae the Lugar Center and the Levin Center at Wayne Law in support of appellee.

Dwayne D. Sam and David Bookbinder were on the brief for amicus curiae Niskanen Center in support of appellee.

Kelsi Brown Corkran, Benjamin F. Aiken, and Sarah H. Sloan were on the brief for amici curiae Professors Jonathan R. Nash, et al. in support of appellee.

Michael J. Miarmi and Rhea Ghosh were on the brief for amici curiae Nixon Impeachment Scholars in support of appellee.

Katharine M. Mapes was on the brief for amicus curiae Morton Rosenberg in support of appellee.

Lawrence S. Robbins, D. Hunter Smith, and Megan Browder were on the brief for amici curiae Former General Counsels of the U.S. House of Representatives in support of appellee.

Before: SRINIVASAN, Chief Judge, HENDERSON, ROGERS, TATEL, GARLAND, GRIFFITH, MILLETT, PILLARD, WILKINS, KATSAS*, and RAO*, Circuit Judges.

Opinion of the Court by Circuit Judge ROGERS.

Dissenting opinion by Circuit Judge HENDERSON.

Dissenting opinion by Circuit Judge GRIFFITH.

ROGERS, Circuit Judge: The question before the en banc court is whether the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives has standing under Article III of the Constitution to seek judicial enforcement of its duly issued subpoena. Upon applying the principles of Article III standing, we hold that it does.

The Constitution charges Congress with certain responsibilities, including to legislate, to conduct oversight of the federal government, and, when necessary, to impeach and remove a President or other Executive Branch official from office. Possession of relevant information is an essential precondition to the effective discharge of all of those duties. Congress cannot intelligently legislate without identifying national problems in need of legislative solution and relying on testimony and data that provide a deeper understanding of those problems, their origins, and potential solutions. It likewise cannot conduct effective oversight of the federal government without detailed information about the operations of its departments and agencies. And it cannot undertake impeachment proceedings without knowing how the official in question has discharged his or her constitutional responsibilities.

---

* Judge Katsas and Judge Rao did not participate in this matter.

4

The Committee, acting on behalf of the full House of Representatives, has shown that it suffers a concrete and particularized injury when denied the opportunity to obtain information necessary to the legislative, oversight, and impeachment functions of the House, and that its injury would be redressed by the order it seeks from the court. The separation of powers and historical practice objections presented here require no different result. Indeed, the ordinary and effective functioning of the Legislative Branch critically depends on the legislative prerogative to obtain information, and constitutional structure and historical practice support judicial enforcement of congressional subpoenas when necessary.

I.

In March 2019, the House Judiciary Committee (“the Committee”) began an investigation into alleged misconduct by President Trump and his close advisors. See H. REP. NO. 116-105, at 13 (2019). Its investigation followed upon publication of the report of Special Counsel Robert S. Mueller. See ROBERT S. MUELLER, III, REPORT ON THE INVESTIGATION INTO RUSSIAN INTERFERENCE IN THE 2016 PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION (2019). During his investigation, the Special Counsel interviewed Donald F. McGahn, II, then serving as White House Counsel. In declining to exonerate the President, the Special Counsel explained that the Office of Legal Counsel (“OLC”) in the Department of Justice had opined that indicting or criminally prosecuting a sitting President would violate the separation of powers. See id., vol. II at 1. The Special Counsel’s Report accordingly concluded that impeachment would be the mechanism to address whether President Trump impermissibly coordinated with the Russian government in connection with the 2016 Presidential election or obstructed justice in the course of the Special Counsel's investigation. See id. The Committee's investigation responded to this conclusion.

The Committee's interest in McGahn's testimony therefore arose in furtherance of the "sole Power of Impeachment" vested in the House of Representatives under Article I, section 2, clause 5 of the Constitution, and included consideration of the amendment or enactment of laws on ethical conduct by Executive Branch officials and oversight of the Department of Justice ("the Department") and the Federal Bureau of Investigation to determine if they were operating with requisite independence. Memorandum from Hon. Jerrold Nadler, Chairman, Comm. on the Judiciary, U.S. House of Representatives, to Members of the Committee, at 4–8 (July 11, 2019) (hereinafter "Nadler Memorandum"); H. REP. NO. 116-346, at 132–34, 159–60 & n.928 (2019); H. REP. NO. 116-105, at 13. The Committee requested that McGahn turn over documents related to the President's alleged obstruction of the Special Counsel's investigation. His testimony would, in turn, inform the Committee's determination of whether President Trump had committed impeachable offenses in obstructing the Special Counsel's investigation and whether to recommend articles of impeachment. McGahn's testimony would also inform House oversight and legislative functions in determining the need for legislation to protect federal law enforcement investigations from improper political interference. Nadler Memorandum at 4–8; H. REP. NO. 116-346, at 132–34, 159–60 & n.928; H. REP. NO. 116-105, at 13.

When McGahn, then no longer White House Counsel, declined these requests, the Committee issued a subpoena on April 22, 2019, ordering McGahn to appear at a May 21, 2019, hearing to testify and to produce the requested documents. On May 20, McGahn's successor as White House Counsel informed the Committee that the President had "directed Mr. McGahn not to appear at the Committee's scheduled hearing" because the OLC had opined that close Presidential advisors were "absolutely immune from compelled congressional testimony." Letter from Pat A. Cipollone, White House Counsel, to Hon. Jerrold Nadler, Chairman, Comm. on the Judiciary, U.S. House of Representatives, at 1–2 (May 20, 2019). McGahn's private counsel confirmed that he would not appear. Letter from William A. Burck to Hon Jerrold Nadler, Chairman, Comm. on the Judiciary, U.S. House of Representatives, at 1 (May 20, 2019).

Although agreement was ultimately reached on the production of the subpoenaed documents, McGahn repeatedly rejected the Committee's continuing offers of accommodations in attempting to secure his testimony. Finally, impasse having been reached, the Committee, as authorized by the House of Representatives in H. RES. 430, 116th Cong. (2019), filed suit in the federal district court on August 17, 2019, to enforce its subpoena. The complaint sought a declaratory judgment "that McGahn's refusal to appear before the Committee in response to the subpoena issued to him was without legal justification" and an injunction "ordering McGahn to appear and testify forthwith before the Committee" "as to matters and information discussed in the Special Counsel's Report and any other matters and information over which executive privilege has been waived or is not asserted." Compl. at 53. The Department of Justice has represented McGahn in this litigation.

The district court, in response to the parties' cross-motions for summary judgment, ruled that the Committee had both standing and a cause of action to enforce its subpoena, and that the court had subject matter jurisdiction over the lawsuit. On the merits, the district court rejected McGahn's claim of absolute immunity from a congressional subpoena and directed him to appear before the Committee. Because McGahn might be entitled to withhold certain information on the basis of recognized privileges, the district court clarified that the injunction required McGahn only to appear before the Committee, not necessarily to answer any questions. Comm. on the Judiciary, U.S. House of Representatives v. McGahn, 415 F. Supp. 3d 148, 214–15 (D.D.C. 2019).

7

Upon McGahn's appeal, a divided three-judge panel of this court held that the Committee lacked Article III standing because of separation-of-powers principles and historical practice. Comm. on the Judiciary, U.S. House of Representatives v. McGahn, 951 F.3d 510 (D.C. Cir. 2020). The court granted the Committee's petition for en banc review to consider whether the Committee has standing to seek enforcement of its subpoena in federal court. Order at 2 (Mar. 13, 2020).

II.

Article III of the Constitution vests in the federal judiciary “[t]he judicial power of the United States,” U.S. CONST. art. III, § 1, which extends to “[c]ases” and “[c]ontroversies,” id. § 2. “‘One element of the case-or-controversy requirement’ is that plaintiffs ‘must establish that they have standing to sue.’” Clapper v. Amnesty Int’l USA, 568 U.S. 398, 408 (2013) (quoting Raines v. Byrd, 521 U.S. 811, 818 (1997)). The standing inquiry is “[t]rained on whether the plaintiff is [a] proper party to bring [a particular lawsuit].” Ariz. State Legislature v. Ariz. Indep. Redistricting Comm’n, 135 S. Ct. 2652, 2663 (2015) (second and third alterations in original) (quoting Raines, 521 U.S. at 818). It “limits the category of litigants empowered to maintain a lawsuit in federal court to seek redress for a legal wrong.” Spokeo v. Robbins, 136 S. Ct. 1540, 1547 (2016). When determining whether a plaintiff has Article III standing, the court must assume that the Committee will prevail on the merits. See Warth v. Seldin, 422 U.S. 490, 500 (1975); Estate of Boyland v. U.S. Dep’t of Agriculture, 913 F.3d 117, 123 (D.C. Cir. 2019). Because “reaching the merits of the dispute would force us to decide whether an action taken by one of the other two branches of the Federal Government was unconstitutional,” the court’s standing inquiry must be “especially rigorous.” Raines, 521 U.S. at 819–20. Our analysis reflects that rigor.

“[T]he ‘irreducible constitutional minimum’ of standing consists of three elements.” Spokeo, 136 S. Ct. at 1547 (quoting Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555, 560 (1992)). “The plaintiff must have (1) suffered an injury in fact, (2) that is fairly traceable to the challenged conduct of the defendant, and (3) that is likely to be redressed by a favorable judicial decision.” Id. At issue is injury in fact, “the ‘[f]irst and foremost’ of standing’s three elements.” Id. (alteration in original) (quoting Steel Co. v. Citizens for a Better Environment, 523 U.S. 83, 103 (1998)). “To establish injury in fact, a plaintiff must show that he or she suffered ‘an invasion of a legally protected interest’ that is ‘concrete and particularized’ and ‘actual or imminent, not conjectural or hypothetical.’” Id. at 1548 (quoting Lujan, 504 U.S. at 560). These are distinct requirements: in addition to being actual or imminent, “an injury in fact must be both concrete and particularized.” Id.

The Supreme Court has confirmed that these general principles of standing apply to institutional injuries claimed by legislative bodies. In Arizona State Legislature v. Arizona Independent Redistricting Commission, 135 S. Ct. 2652 (2015), the Supreme Court held that the Arizona State Legislature had standing to challenge as unconstitutional a ballot provision that vested redistricting authority in an independent agency. See id. at 2665–66. Analyzing whether the legislature had demonstrated standing, the Court invoked its familiar standing test. See id. at 2663. An institutional body seeking to demonstrate standing “‘must show, first and foremost, injury in the form of “invasion of a legally protected interest” that is “concrete and particularized” and “actual or imminent.””’” Id. (quoting Arizonans for Official English v. Arizona, 520 U.S. 43, 64 (1997)). The first element of the test, injury in fact, thus applies to a legislative body seeking to demonstrate standing. The remainder of the test also applies: “[t]he Legislature’s injury must also be ‘fairly traceable to the challenged action’ and ‘redressable by a favorable ruling.’” Id. (quoting Clapper, 568 U.S. at 409).

We begin our analysis here, addressing these general principles of standing, before turning to the special considerations presented by the interbranch nature of this litigation. Ultimately, we hold that the Committee has Article III standing to protect against the denial of that to which it alleges it is entitled, namely McGahn’s testimony in response to its duly issued subpoena. McGahn’s disregard of the subpoena, the validity of which he has never challenged, deprived the Committee of specific information sought in the exercise of its constitutional responsibilities. The Committee is the “proper party” to bring this “particular lawsuit,” id. Because the Committee’s injury has been caused by McGahn’s defiance of its subpoena and can be cured here only by judicial enforcement of the subpoena, the injury is traceable to McGahn’s conduct and judicially redressable. And, contrary to McGahn’s positions, the Committee’s standing is consistent with the system of separated powers and capable of resolution through the judicial process, see Allen v. Wright, 468 U.S. 727, 752 (1984).

10

A.

To be judicially cognizable and form the basis of Article III standing, an injury must be concrete, as opposed to abstract. A concrete injury is an injury that is real; it “must actually exist.” Spokeo, 136 S. Ct. at 1548. “‘Concrete’ is not, however, necessarily synonymous with ‘tangible.’ Although tangible injuries are perhaps easier to recognize,” the Supreme Court has acknowledged “that intangible injuries can nevertheless be concrete.” Id. at 1549.

As to the concreteness of the Committee’s alleged injury, the Supreme Court has acknowledged the essentiality of information to the effective functioning of Congress and long “held that each House has power ‘to secure needed information’” through the subpoena power. Trump v. Mazars USA, LLP, 140 S. Ct. 2019, 2031 (2020) (quoting McGrain v. Daugherty, 273 U.S. 135, 161 (1927)). Because Congress must have access to information to perform its constitutional responsibilities, when Congress “does not itself possess the requisite information — which not infrequently is true — recourse must be had to others who do possess it.” McGrain, 273 U.S. at 175. Therefore, “the power of inquiry — with process to enforce it — is an essential and appropriate auxiliary to the legislative function.” Id. at 174. “Without the power to investigate — including of course the authority to compel testimony, either through its own processes or through judicial trial — Congress could be seriously handicapped in its efforts to exercise its constitutional function wisely and effectively.” Quinn v. United States, 349 U.S. 155, 160–61 (1955); see Mazars, 140 S. Ct. at 2031. That constitutional power entitles each House to the testimony of a witness and production of requested documents in response to a lawful subpoena.

The subpoena power is potent. Each House of Congress is specifically empowered to compel testimony from witnesses and the production of evidence in service of its constitutional functions, and the recipient of a subpoena is obligated by law to comply.

It is unquestionably the duty of all citizens to cooperate with the Congress in its efforts to obtain the facts needed for intelligent legislative action. It is their unremitting obligation to respond to subpoenas, to respect the dignity of the Congress and its committees and to testify fully with respect to matters within the province of proper investigation.

Watkins v. United States, 354 U.S. 178, 187–88 (1957); see Mazars, 140 S. Ct. at 2036 (quoting Watkins, 354 U.S. at 187).

The power of each House of Congress to compel witnesses to appear before it to testify and to produce documentary evidence has a pedigree predating the Founding and has long been employed in Congress's discharge of its primary constitutional responsibilities: legislating, conducting oversight of the federal government, and, when necessary, checking the President through the power of impeachment. Congressional subpoenas have their historical basis in the "emergence of [the English] Parliament." Watkins, 354 U.S. at 188. Congress began using its investigative powers from the earliest days of the Republic to investigate national problems and probe for possible federal solutions. See Mazars, 140 S. Ct. at 2029–30. Yet "[t]he Nation was almost one hundred years old before the first case reached [the Supreme] Court to challenge the use of compulsory process as a legislative device.” Watkins, 354 U.S. at 193. In that case, Kilbourn v. Thompson, 103 U.S. 168 (1881), the Supreme Court held that the House had “exceeded the limit of its own authority” by inquiring into a matter that “could result in no valid legislation on the subject to which the inquiry referred.” Id. at 192, 195. Congress’s power to issue subpoenas in conjunction with legislative investigations was confirmed by the Supreme Court in McGrain, 273 U.S. 135, and Sinclair v. United States, 279 U.S. 263 (1929). “Following these important decisions, . . . there was vigorous use of the investigative process by a Congress bent upon harnessing and directing the vast economic and social forces of the times.” Watkins, 354 U.S. at 195.

Congress commonly uses subpoenas not only to develop legislation but also in furtherance of its oversight of the federal government, including the Executive Branch. This subpoena power “comprehends probes into departments of the Federal Government to expose corruption, inefficiency or waste.” Watkins, 354 U.S. at 187. Subject to certain restraints, see, e.g., id., “[a] legislative inquiry may be as broad, as searching, and as exhaustive as is necessary to make effective the constitutional powers of Congress,” Townsend v. United States, 95 F.2d 352, 361 (D.C. Cir. 1938). Indeed, the Court has recently emphasized that “[u]nless Congress have and use every means of acquainting itself with the acts and the disposition of the administrative agents of the government, the country must be helpless to learn how it is being served.” Mazars, 140 S. Ct. at 2033 (quoting United States v. Rumely, 345 U.S. 41, 43 (1953)).

The House of Representatives employs its subpoena power in service of its constitutional power of impeachment, as the Committee’s investigation illustrates. The Constitution vests in the House of Representatives the “sole Power of Impeachment,” U.S. CONST. art. I, § 2, cl. 5, and thereby empowers the House to set in motion a process that may result in the removal of the President from Office. To level the grave accusation that a President may have committed “Treason, Bribery, or other high Crimes and Misdemeanors,” U.S. CONST. art. II, § 4, the House must be appropriately informed. And it cannot fully inform itself without the power to compel the testimony of those who possess relevant or necessary information. As far back as 1796, George Washington, the Nation’s first President, acknowledged that the House may compel the President to turn over some Executive Branch information if sought as part of an impeachment investigation. See Pres. George Washington, Message to the House Regarding Documents Relative to the Jay Treaty (Mar. 30, 1796); see Mazars, 140 S. Ct. at 2029–30. Decades later, Congress also issued subpoenas to President Nixon during its impeachment investigation of him. See Senate Select Comm. on Presidential Campaign Activities v. Nixon, 498 F.2d 725, 726–27 (D.C. Cir. 1974).

The House, then, has a long-recognized right, based in the Constitution, to have McGahn appear to testify and produce documents. Because each House of Congress delegates its power of inquiry to its Committees, which are “endowed with the full power of Congress to compel testimony,” Watkins, 354 U.S. at 201; HOUSE RULES X & XI, cl. 2(m)(1), the Committee exercised the House’s subpoena power when it issued a subpoena to McGahn. By refusing to testify in response to the Committee’s concededly valid subpoena, McGahn has denied the Committee something to which it alleges it is entitled by law. And because the Committee has alleged the deprivation of testimony to which it is legally entitled, its asserted injury is concrete.

In other contexts, as well, the Supreme Court has held that when a person seeks to obtain information the government is required to disclose, the denial of the information is a concrete injury for standing purposes. For example, in FEC v. Akins, 524 U.S. 11 (1998), the Court held that the plaintiffs had suffered an Article III injury “consist[ing] of their inability to obtain information . . . that, on their view of the law,” they were legally entitled to. Id. at 21. Similarly, in Public Citizen v. DOJ, 491 U.S. 440 (1989), the Court held that plaintiffs incurred an injury sufficient to support standing when they were denied access to agency records to which they were legally entitled. Id. at 449. Akins and Public Citizen thereby support the principle that the denial of information to which the plaintiff claims to be entitled by law establishes a quintessential injury in fact. See Shays v. FEC, 528 F.3d 914, 923 (D.C. Cir. 2008). Here, each House of the Congress has a constitutionally grounded entitlement to obtain information, namely McGahn’s testimony, in carrying out its constitutional functions. McGahn’s denial of the information to which the Committee alleges it is entitled results in informational injury of the kind that the Supreme Court held supported standing in Akins and Public Citizen.

By analogy, private parties undeniably have standing to seek judicial enforcement of compliance with subpoenas. And Courts have regularly entertained lawsuits in which a legislative body seeks to enforce a subpoena against a private party. See, e.g., In re Application of Senate Permanent Subcomm. on Investigations, 655 F.2d 1232 (D.C. Cir. 1981); Senate Select Comm., 498 F.2d 725; Senate Permanent Comm. v. Ferrer, 199 F. Supp. 3d 125 (D.D.C. 2016). Further, the OLC, in opinions never withdrawn, has stated that a House of Congress can file a civil action to seek enforcement of its subpoenas. See Response to Congressional Requests for Information Regarding Decisions Made Under the

15

Independent Counsel Act, 10 Op. O.L.C. 68, 83 (1986) (“Cooper Opinion”); Prosecution for Contempt of Congress of an Executive Branch Official Who Has Asserted a Claim of Executive Privilege, 8 Op. O.L.C. 101, 137 (1984) (“Olson Opinion”). A legislative body, then, generally has standing to sue to obtain information it claims it has been wrongfully denied, at least when a private party is withholding information. McGahn maintains the result is different when the defendant withholding the information is another branch of government, but the reasons he offers do not explain why the identity of the defendant should make a difference for purposes of standing, which is focused on whether the plaintiff is the proper party to bring the lawsuit. See Part III infra.

In sum, by virtue of the House’s long-recognized subpoena power, the Committee was entitled to McGahn’s testimony pursuant to its duly issued subpoena, which he has never challenged, and the specific information the Committee would learn therefrom in connection with carrying out its constitutional duties. By defying the subpoena, McGahn has deprived the Committee of that testimony and that deprivation is a concrete injury.

B.

The Committee’s asserted injury must be not only concrete but also particularized. “For an injury to be ‘particularized,’ it ‘must affect the plaintiff in a personal and individual way.’” Spokeo, 136 S. Ct. at 1548 (quoting Lujan, 504 U.S. at 560 n.1). An injury is not particularized if it is “undifferentiated” and “common to all members of the public.” United States v. Richardson, 418 U.S. 166, 177 (1974) (quoting Ex parte Levitt, 302 U.S. 633, 634 (1937)). The injury, in short, must be specific to the plaintiff.

Virginia House of Delegates v. Bethune-Hill, 139 S. Ct. 1945 (2019), provides some guidance on particularization when a legislative institution seeks to show injury in fact. In that case, the Virginia House of Delegates sought to appeal the judicial invalidation of a redistricting plan in whose enactment it had participated. Id. at 1950. But the Virginia legislature was composed of two houses: the Senate and the House of Delegates. See id. at 1949. And the interest that the House of Delegates asserted — in defending the validity of a redistricting plan that it had approved — was shared with the Senate. See id. at 1953. Thus, to the extent that judicial invalidation of legislation constituted an injury in fact, the House of Delegates as one half of a bicameral legislature was not an appropriate party to vindicate that injury. Rather, to challenge the judicial invalidation, the Senate and House of Delegates would have needed to act together, akin to the circumstances of Arizona State Legislature, “in which the Court recognized the standing of the Arizona House and Senate — acting together — to challenge a referendum.” Id. at 1953. What undermined the House of Delegates’ attempt to show standing was the “mismatch between the body seeking to litigate and the body to which the relevant [state] constitutional provision allegedly assigned . . . authority.” Id. Although not explicitly couched in terms of particularization, the Court’s focus on “mismatch” is an inquiry into whether the claimed injury is personal to the plaintiff or else shared by a larger group of which the plaintiff is only a component — in other words, whether the injury is particularized.

The Committee’s asserted injury is particularized because the Committee “is an institutional plaintiff asserting an institutional injury,” Ariz. State Legislature, 135 S. Ct. at 2664. There is no “mismatch” here, Va. House of Delegates, 139 S. Ct. at 1953: the body whose informational and investigative prerogatives have been infringed is the body authorized by House Resolution 430 to bring the present lawsuit. The power to issue a subpoena “may be exercised by a committee acting . . . on behalf of one of the Houses” of Congress. Eastland v. U.S. Servicemen’s Fund, 421 U.S. 491, 505 (1975). The full House of Representatives has delegated its subpoena authority to its Committees, empowering each Committee “to require, by subpoena or otherwise, the attendance and testimony of such witnesses and the production of such books, records, correspondence, memoranda, papers, and documents as it considers necessary.” HOUSE RULE XI, cl. 2(m)(1). A House Committee that issues a subpoena, including the Committee on the Judiciary, thus exercises the subpoena power of the full House.

The House Judiciary Committee has issued the McGahn subpoena on behalf of, and with the authorization of, the full House of Representatives. There is no dispute that the House as an institution may unilaterally obtain what its authorized Committee seeks to compel here: McGahn’s testimony. The Senate naturally need not sign off on the House’s subpoenas; so it need not join efforts to vindicate them in the courts. Because the Committee exercised the investigative authority of the full House, the Committee was entitled to McGahn’s testimony. Denial of his testimony is a deprivation that is a concrete injury and because the plaintiff is the distinctly injured party, the injury is particularized.

The House of Representatives has a unique interest under the Constitution in vindicating this injury. The Constitution places in the House sole responsibility to determine whether to file articles of impeachment against the President. U.S. CONST. art. 1, § 2, cl. 5. The subpoena power of the House exercised by the Committee in subpoenaing McGahn relates directly to that responsibility. The House’s other constitutional functions of legislation and oversight are also handicapped by McGahn’s defiance of the subpoena, as explained in the Nadler Memorandum. Because of delegations pursuant to House Rules and passage of a House Resolution authorizing the present lawsuit, the Committee is an appropriate plaintiff to vindicate that injury.

C.

The remaining two prongs of the traditional standing test — that the injury is “fairly traceable to the challenged conduct” and “is likely to be redressed by a favorable [judicial] decision,” Va. House of Delegates, 139 S. Ct. at 1950 — are readily met. The injury that the Committee asserts has been directly caused by McGahn’s conduct that it seeks to have enjoined. McGahn’s refusal to testify before the Committee in response to a valid subpoena is responsible for the denial of information to which the Committee claims it is entitled and the resulting handicapping of the House’s discharge of its constitutional obligations that the Committee now seeks to remedy in this lawsuit.

The injury is also likely to be redressed by a favorable judicial decision. The Committee’s lawsuit seeks “declaratory and injunctive relief” “[d]eclar[ing] that McGahn’s refusal to appear before the Committee in response to the subpoena issued to him was without legal justification” and “ordering McGahn to appear and testify forthwith before the Committee.” Compl. at 53. If the court grants the Committee that relief, the deprivation that the Committee has suffered will be remedied. The Committee has therefore demonstrated redressability.

19

III.

The present lawsuit, brought by a Committee of the House of Representatives against a former White House Counsel, implicates considerations not always present in a standing dispute. McGahn contends that under Raines v. Byrd, 521 U.S. 811, separation of powers analysis prevents judicial airing and resolution of interbranch informational disputes like this one. Additionally, he views Raines itself, in particular its emphasis on history, to bar the present lawsuit. Each line of argument asserts a structural barrier to judicial involvement in informational disputes between the elected branches. With notable exceptions dating back at least to the 1970s, Congress and the Executive have “managed for over two centuries to resolve [informational] disputes among themselves.” Mazars, 140 S. Ct. at 2031. That “longstanding practice . . . imposes on us a duty of care to ensure that we not needlessly disturb ‘the compromises and working arrangements that [those] branches . . . themselves have reached.’” Id. (second and third alterations in original) (quoting NLRB v. Noel Canning, 573 U.S. 513, 524–26 (2014)). Our analysis demonstrates that holding the Committee has Article III standing involves no such disturbance.

A.

“[T]he law of Art[icle] III standing is built on a single basic idea — the idea of separation of powers.” Raines, 521 U.S. at 820 (quoting Allen, 468 U.S. at 752). In turn, “federal courts may exercise power . . . only when adjudication is ‘consistent with a system of separated powers,’” Allen, 468 U.S. at 752 (quoting Chi. & Grand Trunk Ry. Co. v. Wellman, 143 U.S. 339, 345 (1892)). The court’s standing analysis has accounted for and ensured the federal judiciary’s limited constitutional role, and the court does not act outside its

20

“properly limited . . . role,” Warth, 422 U.S. at 498, in holding that the Committee has standing. But McGahn maintains that in exercising jurisdiction over the present lawsuit and resolving whether he is required to testify, the court takes sides in an interbranch dispute, aggrandizes Congress at the expense of the Executive, or otherwise disrupts the balance of powers between the Branches. To the contrary, the judiciary, in exercising jurisdiction over the present lawsuit, does not arrogate any new power to itself at the expense of either of the other branches but rather plays its appropriate constitutional role.

1.

At the outset, there is reason for some skepticism regarding the foundation of McGahn’s contention that all of the separation of powers objections he raises bear on whether the Committee has Article III standing. After all, as the Supreme Court has long emphasized, “the requirement of standing ‘focuses on the party seeking to get his complaint before a federal court and not on the issues he wishes to have adjudicated.’” Valley Forge Christian Coll. v. Ams. United for Separation of Church & State, Inc., 454 U.S. 464, 484 (1982) (quoting Flast v. Cohen, 392 U.S. 83, 99 (1968)). The statement in Raines, 521 U.S. at 820, that separation of powers was the “single basic idea” on which standing is based, appropriately reflects the “overriding and time-honored concern about keeping the Judiciary’s power within its proper constitutional sphere.” It does not mean, as McGahn maintains, that merely invoking separation of powers principles defeats standing in interbranch disputes like this one. Not every separation of powers concern — including some that McGahn raises here — implicates the separation of powers principle underlying the standing doctrine, namely confining the judiciary to its proper role. And in any event, the separation of powers objections McGahn raises do not withstand analysis and are therefore unpersuasive. Moreover, other separation of powers doctrines not before the en banc court, including the non-justiciability of political questions, separately address whether the court should decline to reach the merits of interbranch disputes. See Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186 (1962).

McGahn points to Chenoweth v. Clinton, 181 F.3d 112 (D.C. Cir. 1999), where this court stated that it understood itself to be “require[d] . . . to merge our separation of powers and standing analyses.” Id. at 116. On its face, that statement appears to support the position that all of the separation of powers objections that McGahn raises bear on the issue of the Committee’s standing. Yet in Chenoweth, the court was considering only whether individual Members of the House of Representatives had standing to sue the President to enjoin the implementation of a Presidential initiative. The court stated that in the past it had dismissed such individual legislator lawsuits not on standing grounds but rather on the basis of “‘circumscribed equitable discretion,’” under which “‘the court would decline to hear the complaint of a Congressman who ‘could obtain substantial relief from his fellow legislators.’” Id. at 114 (quoting Riegle v. Federal Open Market Comm., 656 F.2d 873, 881 (D.C. Cir. 1981)). The separation of powers consideration that the court viewed as being a necessary part of its standing analysis was the need for the judiciary to “avoid ‘meddl[ing] in the internal affairs of the legislative branch,’” id. at 116 (alteration in original) (quoting Moore v. U.S. House of Representatives, 733 F.2d 946, 956 (D.C. Cir. 1984)), by entertaining a lawsuit by an individual legislator whose “rights [could] be vindicated by congressional repeal of the [offending] statute,” id. at 115 (alterations in original) (quoting Moore, 733 F.2d at 956). It is this limited separation of powers concern, in the context of individual legislator suits and not implicated here, that Chenoweth stated must be part of the standing analysis.

So too in Arizona State Legislature, the Supreme Court stated that “a suit between Congress and the President would raise separation-of-powers concerns absent” in that case, which involved a state legislative body. Ariz. State Legislature, 135 S. Ct. at 2665 n.12. The Court did not hold that such concerns should be considered separately to preclude a legislative body’s lawsuit against the Executive Branch but rather emphasized its directive from Raines for a standing analysis that is “especially rigorous when reaching the merits of the dispute would force [the Court] to decide whether an action taken by one of the other two branches of the Federal Government was unconstitutional.” Id. (quoting Raines, 521 U.S. at 819–20). Because the Committee has identified a concrete injury, namely a former Executive Branch official’s defiance of a valid subpoena, and is the institution duly authorized to maintain the present lawsuit, the obstacles to suits by individual legislators are inapplicable.

This court, however, need not resolve whether Raines, Chenoweth, or Arizona State Legislature stands for the proposition that any objection that falls within the broad ambit of “separation of powers” may defeat a plaintiff’s standing because none of McGahn’s separation of powers objections to the Committee’s standing is persuasive.

The Supreme Court’s recent decision in Trump v. Mazars USA, LLP elaborates on the separation of powers concerns where Congress and the President are at odds over information. The Court stated because “Congress and the President have an ongoing institutional relationship as the ‘opposite’ and ‘rival’ political branches established by the Constitution, . . . congressional subpoenas directed at the President differ markedly” from those issued to private parties. Mazars, 140 S. Ct. at 2033–34 (quoting FEDERALIST NO. 51 (J. Madison)).

That is, “congressional subpoenas for the President’s information unavoidably pit the political branches against one another” and represent “a clash between rival branches of government over [testimony] of intense political interest for all involved.” Id. at 2034. Mazars addressed the merits of a challenge to the validity of a congressional subpoena, not the plaintiff’s standing, but the concerns about the adjudication of such interbranch disputes expressed in Mazars may be implicated here. Such concerns do not bar the Committee’s standing, however. Much of the Supreme Court’s attention was directed to the implications of a “limitless” congressional subpoena power that “would transform the ‘established practice’ of the political branches.” Id. at 16 (quoting Noel Canning, 573 U.S. at 524). This court explains in responding to McGahn’s separation of powers objections, see Part III.A.2 infra, why allowing the Committee to proceed with the present lawsuit would preserve, rather than disrupt, that historical practice of accommodation. Furthermore, McGahn has never challenged the validity of the Committee’s subpoena.

2.

McGahn begins his separation of powers objections by maintaining that if the Committee has standing, then Congress will have been provided “a blueprint for extensive expansion of the legislative power’ by allowing Congress to ‘arrogate power to itself,’” empowering Congress to unilaterally resolve informational disputes without engaging in the historical practice of negotiating informational disputes with the Executive Branch. Appellant Br. at 24–25 (quoting Free Enter. Fund v. Public Co. Accounting Oversight Bd., 561 U.S. 477, 500 (2010)). Courts must take care not to disrupt the “longstanding practice” of accommodation between the political branches. Mazars, 140 S. Ct. at 2031. But there is no congressional “arrogation” of power here and no threat that the court's decision will disrupt the historical practice of accommodation. To the contrary, permitting Congress to bring this lawsuit preserves the power of subpoena that the House of Representatives is already understood to possess. Rather, it is McGahn's challenge to the Committee's standing that seeks to alter the status quo ante and aggrandize the power of the Executive Branch at the expense of Congress.

For more than forty years this circuit has held that a House of Congress has standing to pursue a subpoena enforcement lawsuit in federal court. See Comm. on Oversight & Gov't Reform v. Holder, 979 F. Supp. 2d 1, 20–22 (D.D.C. 2013); Comm. on the Judiciary, U.S. House of Representatives v. Miers, 558 F. Supp. 2d 53, 68–78 (D.D.C. 2008); United States v. AT&T, 551 F.2d 384, 391 (D.C. Cir. 1976); Senate Select Comm., 498 F.2d at 728; see also Part III.B.2 infra. McGahn does not suggest that any court, prior to the vacated panel majority in the present case, has ever ruled to the contrary. Congress and the Executive Branch have long operated under the assumption that Congress may, if necessary, seek enforcement of a subpoena in federal court.

Accepting McGahn's position that the Committee lacks standing would significantly curtail the possibility of accommodation. That outcome would upset settled expectations and dramatically alter bargaining positions in the accommodation process over informational disputes in the future. Without the possibility of enforcement of a subpoena issued by a House of Congress, the Executive Branch faces little incentive to reach a negotiated agreement in an informational dispute. Indeed, the threat of a subpoena enforcement lawsuit may be an essential tool in keeping the Executive Branch at the negotiating table. For example, President Clinton and a Senate subcommittee “[e]ventually . . . reached an agreement” over an informational dispute only after “a Senate threat to seek judicial enforcement of the subpoena.” Mazars, 140 S. Ct. at 2030. Without that possibility, Presidents could direct widescale non-compliance with lawful inquiries by a House of Congress, secure in the knowledge that little can be done to enforce its subpoena — as President Trump did here. See Letter from Pat A. Cipollone, White House Counsel, to Hon. Nancy Pelosi, Speaker of the House, et al., at 7 (Oct. 8, 2019). Traditional congressional oversight of the Executive Branch would be replaced by a system of voluntary Presidential disclosures, potentially limiting Congress to learning only what the President wants it to learn. And the power of impeachment, the “essential check . . . upon the encroachments of the executive,” FEDERALIST NO. 66 (A. Hamilton), would be diminished because a President would be unlikely to voluntarily turn over information that could lead to impeachment.

Neither does holding that the Committee has Article III standing displace the historical practice of accommodation, as McGahn maintains. Litigation, as the General Counsel to the Committee emphasized to this court during oral argument, is not a preferred option of politicians. See En Banc Oral Arg. Tr. at 121–22. The subpoena to McGahn was issued over 15 months ago and litigation over its enforcement continues. A Congress lasts for only two years, see U.S. CONST. art. I, § 2, cl. 1; id. amend. XX, § 1, and the current Congress may expire before the House of Representative can complete the present litigation and obtain judicial enforcement of its subpoena. Despite the Committee’s subpoena of McGahn in regard to its investigation pursuant to the House’s “sole Power of Impeachment,” U.S. CONST. art. I, § 2, cl. 5, and its continuing efforts to reach accommodations for McGahn to testify, the President refused to permit McGahn to testify, see Cipollone Letter of May 20, 2019, to Chairman Nadler, at 1–2, and subsequently refused to allow any member of the Executive Branch to cooperate with the Committee's investigation, see Cipollone Letter of Oct. 8, 2019, to Speaker Pelosi, at 7. In such circumstances, where there is an impasse contrary to traditional norms, no practicable alternative to litigation exists. That result stems not from the court's holding that the Committee has standing to seek judicial enforcement of its subpoena, but from a rare breakdown in the accommodation process itself. The parties' historical responsibility to engage in negotiations to resolve their interbranch informational disputes, see United States v. AT&T, 567 F.2d 121, 127 (D.C. Cir. 1977), remains unaffected by holding that the Committee has Article III standing.

McGahn next maintains that resolving this interbranch dispute would constitute a judicial arrogation of power at the expense of Congress and the Executive, which ought to resolve it themselves. "In order to remain faithful to [the federal government's] tripartite structure, the power of the Federal Judiciary may not be permitted to intrude upon the powers given to the other branches." Spokeo, 136 S. Ct. at 1547. But by permitting the Committee to bring a lawsuit in federal court to enforce its subpoena, the court is not enlarging the power or prerogatives of the federal judiciary. To the contrary, subpoena enforcement is a "familiar judicial exercise," Zivotofsky ex rel. Zivotofsky v. Clinton, 566 U.S. 189, 196 (2012), a not unusual corollary to civil litigation. The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure authorize a party to issue, under the auspices of the court, a subpoena ordering testimony, document production, or production of other tangible objects. See FED. R. CIV. P. 45(a). Upon objection by the recipient of such a civil subpoena that compliance would require the disclosure of privileged matter, a motion requesting that the court quash the subpoena would be available. See FED. R. CIV. P. 45(e)(2). The court must quash or modify the subpoena if it determines that the subpoena "requires disclosure of privileged or other protected matter."

FED. R. CIV. P. 45(d)(3). When the party has no valid grounds for objecting, the court may enforce the subpoena by holding in contempt a person who refuses to obey it. See FED. R. CIV. P. 45(g). Thus, the precise function that the Committee asks the court to perform, namely determining whether McGahn has a valid excuse for refusing to appear and testify before the Committee and compelling his compliance with its subpoena if he does not, is a traditional feature of civil litigation in federal court.

Further, contrary to McGahn's assertion, the court does not impermissibly take sides in an interbranch dispute by holding that the Committee has standing and resolving whether or not McGahn is required to appear and testify. What the Committee seeks through its subpoena enforcement lawsuit is resolution of a discrete and limited legal issue: whether McGahn must appear before it to testify, absent invocation of a valid privilege that would excuse his refusal to answer specific questions. Given McGahn's previous role as a close presidential advisor, it is plausible that Executive privilege could be properly asserted in response to at least some of the Committee's questions, depending on their substance. See generally United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683, 705 (1974). Such a potentially available privilege is a powerful protection of the President's interest in Executive Branch confidentiality, and it remains unaffected by an order compelling McGahn to appear and testify before the Committee. Consequently, entertaining the Committee's subpoena enforcement lawsuit does not raise the specter that the judiciary is taking sides in an interbranch dispute. A court is not normally understood to be taking sides when it enforces a subpoena in civil litigation, and McGahn points to nothing to support a contrary conclusion here.

McGahn also maintains that exercising jurisdiction would impede the Executive in the performance of its constitutional responsibilities because only the Executive Branch is constitutionally empowered to “conduct[] civil litigation in the courts of the United States for vindicating public rights,” Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 140 (1976). The traditional means of enforcing congressional subpoenas, according to McGahn, has been through the criminal contempt statute, 2 U.S.C. § 192, which can result in imprisonment of up to one year and a fine of up to $1,000. When a House of Congress holds a person in contempt, the recalcitrant subpoena recipient may be referred to the Department of Justice for criminal prosecution. McGahn asserts that by attempting to enforce its subpoena directly in federal court and circumventing the Executive’s prosecutorial role, the House infringes on the Executive’s exclusive authority to enforce the law. Yet the OLC has repeatedly opined that the criminal contempt statute does not and could not apply to a close Presidential advisor. See, e.g., Testimonial Immunity Before Congress of the Former Counsel to the President, 2019 WL 2315338, at *14 (O.L.C. May 20, 2019); Whether the Department of Justice May Prosecute White House Officials for Contempt of Congress, 32 Op. O.L.C. 65, 68–69 (2008) Cooper Opinion, 10 Op. O.L.C. at 83; Olson Opinion, 8 Op. O.L.C. at 142; see also Part III.B.2 infra. So understood, the Department almost certainly would not pursue prosecution of McGahn. Moreover, although the Supreme Court in Buckley pointed to the constitutional principle that law enforcement is the exclusive province of the Executive Branch, the Court distinguished between the Executive Branch’s law enforcement authority and Congress’s “powers . . . essentially of an investigative and informative nature.” Buckley, 424 U.S. at 137. The argument that the present lawsuit would circumvent the President’s performance of his constitutional law enforcement responsibilities is misplaced.

McGahn maintains as well that assuming jurisdiction here threatens to undermine the judiciary itself. Judicial “intervention” in an “interbranch dispute,” he argues, could “risk damaging the public confidence that is vital to the functioning of the Judicial Branch.” Appellant Supp. Br. at 2 (quoting Raines, 521 U.S. at 833 (Souter, J., joined by Ginsburg, J., concurring in the judgment)). That risk is minimal here not only because the Committee is a proper plaintiff, but also because the issue that the Committee asks the court to decide can be answered by applying established legal doctrines without the court weighing in on the political dispute between the House and the President. Adjudication of whether McGahn must appear and testify in compliance with the Committee’s concededly valid subpoena does not “raise[] [the] specter of judicial readiness to enlist on one side of a political tug-of-war,” Raines, 521 U.S. at 834 (Souter, J., concurring in the judgment). Although the present lawsuit unfolded in the context of a highly charged political battle over whether to impeach the President, the court “has a responsibility to decide cases properly before it, even those it ‘would gladly avoid,’” and “courts cannot avoid their responsibility merely ‘because the issues have political implications.’” Zivotofsky, 566 U.S. at 194, 196 (first quoting Cohens v. Virginia, 19 U.S. (6 Wheat) 264, 404 (1821), then quoting INS v. Chadha, 462 U.S. 919, 943 (1983)). Once the Committee has met its burden to show that it has Article III standing to seek judicial enforcement of its subpoena, the court may not avoid its responsibility to decide the case because of its political context or consequences.

McGahn maintains too that courts lack the authority to “adjudicate disputes exclusively between the political branches even where no individual party’s rights are at stake.” Appellant Supp. Br. at 16. That objection is foreclosed by Raines and Arizona State Legislature. In Raines, the Court stated that “the institutional injury [plaintiffs] allege is wholly abstract and widely dispersed.” Raines, 521 U.S. at 829. By identifying those two defects with the alleged institutional injury, the Court left open the possibility that some institutional injuries would be sufficient to confer a legislative body standing. In other words, if no institutional injury to a legislative body would be adequate to confer standing, then the Court in Raines would not have bothered to identify shortcomings with the specific institutional injury alleged, namely, that it was “wholly abstract and widely dispersed.” The Court need only have stated that the alleged injury was an institutional one incurred by a legislative body and left it at that. In Arizona State Legislature v. Arizona Independent Redistricting Commission, 135 S. Ct. 2652, the Supreme Court held that the Arizona State Legislature had incurred an institutional injury where it sought to challenge as unconstitutional a ballot provision vesting redistricting authority in an independent agency. Again, the Court’s holding precludes the view that there is standing only when an individual right is implicated. See also Sixty-Seventh Minn. State Senate v. Beens, 406 U.S. 187 (1972).

B.

McGahn additionally advances an interpretation of the Supreme Court’s decision in Raines v. Byrd, 521 U.S. 811, to require the conclusion that the Committee lacks Article III standing. He ignores Raines’s limits. The Supreme Court has given clear direction that Raines is a narrow case about the standing only of individual legislators. Nevertheless, McGahn relies on Raines to argue that the present dispute is not one “traditionally thought to be capable of resolution through the judicial process,” Raines, 521 U.S. at 819. The history of judicial adjudication of such disputes undermines McGahn’s conclusion.

31

1.

In Raines, six Members of Congress sued the Director of the U.S. Office of Management and Budget to challenge the constitutionality of the Line Item Veto Act, which authorized the President to cancel spending provisions in enacted appropriations statutes. Id. at 814–15. The Supreme Court held that the individual members of Congress lacked standing. Id. at 829. The Court has since clarified that Raines is a decision narrowly concerned with the standing of individual Members of Congress. In Arizona State Legislature, the Court explained that “[i]n Raines, [the] Court held that six individual Members of Congress lacked standing to challenge the Line Item Veto Act,” “holding specifically and only that ‘individual members of Congress [lack] Article III standing.’” Ariz. State Legislature, 135 S. Ct. at 2664 (third alteration in original) (quoting Raines, 521 U.S. at 813–14). And in Virginia House of Delegates v. Bethune-Hill, 139 S. Ct. 1945, the Supreme Court referenced Raines in deciding that a single house of a bicameral state legislature did not have standing to appeal judicial invalidation of a state redistricting plan, relying on Raines only for the narrow proposition that “individual members lack standing to assert the institutional interests of a legislature.” Id. at 1953.

The Supreme Court has not stated that Raines would bar a lawsuit brought by an authorized legislative institution asserting an institutional injury. See Raines, 521 U.S. at 829–30. Guided by Arizona State Legislature and by Raines itself, this court has understood Raines to concern the standing of individual members of a legislative body and relied on it to hold that unauthorized legislators lack standing to sue the President to vindicate injuries to the legislative bodies of which they are a part. See Blumenthal v. Trump, 949 F.3d 14 (D.C. Cir. 2020); Campbell v. Clinton, 203 F.3d 19 (D.C. Cir. 2000);

Chenoweth, 181 F.3d 112. All of those cases involved individual unauthorized legislators' attempts to sue the President. In Blumenthal, the court stated that "Raines is our starting point when individual members of Congress seek judicial remedies." Blumenthal, 949 F.3d at 19. The court cited approvingly "[t]he Supreme Court's recent summary reading of Raines that 'individual members' of the Congress 'lack standing to assert the institutional interests of a legislature' in the same way 'a single House of a bicameral legislature lacks capacity to assert interests belonging to the legislature as a whole.'" Id. (quoting Va. House of Delegates, 139 S. Ct. at 1953–54). And in Campbell the court treated Raines as a case about individual legislator standing, stating that "[t]he question whether congressmen have standing in federal court to challenge the lawfulness of actions of the executive was answered, at least in large part, in the Supreme Court's recent decision in Raines v. Byrd." Campbell, 203 F.3d at 20.

Arizona State Legislature and Virginia House of Delegates as well as this court's precedent confirm that Raines stands for the proposition that whereas a legislative institution may properly assert an institutional injury, an individual member of that institution generally may not. McGahn would have this court disregard the clear limit that the Supreme Court itself has placed on Raines's reach, something this lower court may not do.

2.

Finally, McGahn contends that the reasoning of Raines defeats the standing of an entire House of Congress. Taken on its own terms, Raines does not require the court to hold that the Committee lacks Article III standing. In Raines, the Supreme Court identified four considerations on which it relied in holding the individual Members of Congress lacked standing: (1) the individual plaintiffs alleged an institutional injury that was “wholly abstract and widely dispersed”; (2) plaintiffs’ “attempt to litigate th[eir] dispute at this time [wa]s contrary to historical experience”; (3) the plaintiffs “ha[d] not been authorized to represent their respective Houses of Congress . . . , and indeed both Houses actively oppose[d] their suit”; and (4) dismissing the lawsuit “neither deprive[d] Members of Congress of an adequate remedy . . . , nor foreclose[d] the Act from constitutional challenge.” Raines, 521 U.S. at 829. The Court added, moreover, that “[w]hether the case would be different if any of these circumstances were different we need not now decide.” Id. at 829–30. None of the four considerations is present here.

In Part II supra, the court explained that the Committee’s injury is concrete and particularized and thus neither abstract nor widely dispersed. The Committee, unlike the unauthorized individual legislators in Raines, was authorized by House Resolution 430 to bring the present lawsuit to enforce its subpoena. And the OLC has twice opined that a civil enforcement suit is the only practicable way that a House of Congress may enforce a subpoena against a current or former Executive Branch official asserting Executive privilege, because neither subpoena enforcement alternative — prosecution by the Department for violation of the criminal contempt statute or detention by the House pursuant to its inherent contempt authority — is practicable. See Cooper Opinion, 10 Op. O.L.C. at 83; Olson Opinion, 8 Op. O.L.C. at 140, 142. The criminal contempt statute is not available to vindicate the House’s injury because the “contempt of Congress statute does not require and could not constitutionally require a prosecution” of an Executive Branch official who defies a congressional subpoena on the basis of Executive privilege “or even . . . a referral to a grand jury of the facts relating to the alleged contempt.” Olson Opinion, 8 Op. O.L.C. at 142. The alternative, detaining McGahn pursuant to the House’s inherent contempt authority, is similarly impracticable. Because Congress has not exercised its inherent contempt authority against an Executive Branch official since 1917, “it seems most unlikely that Congress would dispatch the Sergeant-at-Arms to arrest and imprison an Executive Branch official who claimed executive privilege.” Cooper Opinion, 10 Op. O.L.C. at 86. The prospect that the House will direct its Sergeant at Arms to arrest McGahn is vanishingly slim so long as a more peaceable judicial alternative remains available.

McGahn emphasizes the historical analysis in Raines and concludes that because federal courts have not historically entertained congressional subpoena enforcement lawsuits, the Committee lacks standing. There are serious flaws to his argument, not the least of which is that the Court’s discussion of history in Raines informed its conclusion that individual legislator plaintiffs lacked standing, but did not append to the three-pronged standing analysis an entirely distinct historical prong.

Nor does the relevant historical practice support McGahn’s position. For more than forty years this circuit has acknowledged that defiance of a subpoena issued by a House of Congress constitutes an institutional injury in fact that is judiciary remediable. In Senate Select Committee on Presidential Campaign Activities v. Nixon, 498 F.2d 725, the en banc court declined to enforce a Senate Committee subpoena duces tecum served on the President for production of the “Nixon tapes.” In reaching the merits the court observed without disagreement that the district court had rejected the President’s contention that the lawsuit was a non-justiciable interbranch conflict. See id. at 728. “Finding the reasoning of this court in Nixon v. Sirica, which concerned a grand jury subpoena, ‘equally applicable to the subpoena of a congressional committee,’ the [d]istrict [c]ourt held that, under that case and the relevant Supreme Court precedent, the issues presented to it were justiciable.” Id. (quoting Senate Select Comm. on Presidential Campaign Activities v. Nixon, 370 F. Supp. 521, 522 (D.D.C. 1974)). This court, satisfied with that analysis, proceeded to address the merits. See id. at 728–29.

This court revisited a similar issue two years later in United States v. AT&T, 551 F.2d 384. The United States sued to enjoin AT&T from complying with a congressional Committee subpoena on national security grounds. The President had directed AT&T, “as an agent of the United States, to respectfully decline to comply with the Committee subpoena,” id. at 387, and the House of Representatives had intervened as a defendant to represent its interest in AT&T’s compliance with the subpoena. The court characterized the case as a “portentous clash between the executive and legislative branches,” id. at 385, and undertook a more extensive jurisdictional analysis than it had in Senate Select Committee. It concluded that “Senate Select Committee establishes, at a minimum, that the mere fact that there is a conflict between the legislative and executive Branches over a congressional subpoena does not preclude judicial resolution of the conflict.” Id. at 390. The court held that “[i]t is clear that the House as a whole has standing to assert its investigatory power.” Id. at 391.

Contrary to McGahn’s position that the relative recency of this historical practice renders it irrelevant, historical practice is constitutionally significant even when it does not extend as far back into the past as the Founding. Interpreting the Recess Appointment Clause of the Constitution, the Supreme Court stated in NLRB v. Noel Canning, 573 U.S. 513, that “in interpreting the Clause, we put significant weight upon historical practice,” and that “precedent[] show[s] that this Court has treated practice as an important interpretive factor even when the nature or longevity of that practice is subject to dispute, and even when that practice began after the founding era.” Id. at 524–26; see id. at 525–26 (collecting cases). McGahn’s narrow view of relevant history is at odds with this recent pronouncement of the Supreme Court in the context of the constitutional separation of powers.

In fact, the relevant history includes a long tradition of Presidential cooperation with the Legislative Branch exercising its constitutional responsibilities. Although there have been relatively few instances of interbranch subpoena enforcement litigation, the history of Presidential cooperation has meant that there have been few occasions necessitating resort to the courts. The Committee explains: “[E]arly Presidents overwhelmingly complied with Congressional inquiries, reflecting their understanding that they had a constitutional obligation to cooperate.” Appellee Supp. Br. at 14; see Mazars, 140 S. Ct. at 2031. The Presidents and the Houses of Congress traditionally have been able to resolve disputes over requests for Executive Branch documents and testimony. Even in pitched disputes between the branches, each branch traditionally has displayed respect for the constitutional prerogatives of the other branch and responded accordingly. See Appellee Supp. Br. at 14–18. The apparently unprecedented categorical direction by President Trump that no member of the Executive Branch shall cooperate with the Committee’s impeachment investigation, see Cipollone Letter of Oct. 8, 2019, to Speaker Pelosi, at 7, likely explains the infrequency of subpoena enforcement lawsuits such as the present one. See Appellee Supp. Br. at 17–18; see id. at 26.

In conclusion, the present lawsuit does not “run[] afoul” of the “structural principle” underlying the standing inquiry,

Allen, 468 U.S. at 761, including the proper role of the judiciary and preservation of the status quo ante between the branches for over 200 years. Holding that the Committee has standing would safeguard the separation of powers. It would ensure the continuation of the “established practice” of accommodation by preserving the legal background against which the political branches have historically negotiated their informational disputes. It would ensure that in the rare case — here in the course of no less than an impeachment investigation — when the political branches have reached an impasse despite repeated attempts to resolve an informational dispute themselves, a congressional Committee can seek judicial enforcement of its duly issued subpoena. Preserving the power of a House of Congress to ensure compliance with its subpoena, in turn, enables it to carry out its constitutional responsibilities, which include serving as an essential check on the President and the Executive Branch, Federalist No. 66 (A. Hamilton); see Federalist No. 69 (A. Hamilton). The Supreme Court has placed clear limits on the scope of Raines’s holding, and taken on its own terms Raines is consistent with the Committee’s standing. In particular, the history of judicial adjudication of interbranch informational disputes not unlike the present one undermines McGahn’s position that courts have not heretofore resolved such disputes.

Our dissenting colleagues reprise the views expressed in their panel opinions that have been vacated by the order granting the Committee’s petition for rehearing en banc. They take a different path than the en banc court in resolving the standing issue in the present litigation, largely adopting the positions that McGahn advocates. As explained at length, those contentions are unpersuasive. Given the rigor with which the en banc court has addressed the Article III standing issue and analyzed McGahn’s positions, there is no need to respond further to each our of dissenting colleagues’ opinions, other than to underscore that the separation of powers and history are an integral part of, not divorced from, the en banc court's standing inquiry. And because the only issue before the en banc court is the Committee's Article III standing, this is not the occasion to respond to their views on other challenges raised by McGahn.

38

* * * *

Accordingly, we hold that the Committee has Article III standing to seek enforcement in federal court of its duly issued subpoena in the performance of constitutional responsibilities. Therefore, we affirm the judgment of the district court in part. Consideration of McGahn's other contentions — including threshold pre-merits objections that there is no subject matter jurisdiction and no applicable cause of action, and potential consideration of the merits if reached — remain to be decided and are remanded to the panel to address in the first instance.

KAREN LECRAFT HENDERSON, Circuit Judge, dissenting: The Court holds today that the Committee on the Judiciary of the United States House of Representatives (Committee) has Article III standing to bring suit in federal court to enforce subpoenas against the Executive Branch. I dissent for the reasons stated in my concurrence in Committee on the Judiciary of the United States House of Representatives v. McGahn, 951 F.3d 510, 531–42 (D.C. Cir. 2020), vacated, reh’g en banc granted sub nom. U.S. House of Representatives v. Mnuchin, No. 19-5176, 2020 WL 1228477 (D.C. Cir. Mar. 13, 2020), and I incorporate by reference thereto that previously published opinion as my dissent here. I write separately, however, to address recent Supreme Court case law whose effect the majority has minimized.

“Standing to sue is a doctrine rooted in the traditional understanding of a case or controversy,” Spokeo, Inc. v. Robins, 136 S. Ct. 1540, 1547 (2016), which, “[i]n the constitutional sense, . . . means the kind of controversy courts traditionally resolve,” United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683, 696 (1974). Derived “[f]rom Article III’s limitation of the judicial power . . . and the separation-of-powers principles underlying that limitation,” Lexmark Int’l, Inc. v. Static Control Components, Inc., 572 U.S. 118, 125 (2014), our standing inquiry therefore “serves to identify those disputes which are appropriately resolved through the judicial process,” Whitmore v. Arkansas, 495 U.S. 149, 155 (1990). This suit is not one of them.

For over two hundred years, the coordinate branches did not enlist the Judiciary in their fights. But our court did not leave well enough alone and, roughly forty years ago, set about to “umpire disputes between th[e] branches regarding their respective powers.” Moore v. U.S. House of Representatives, 733 F.2d 946, 959 (D.C. Cir. 1984) (Scalia, J., concurring in the judgment). This approach started to collapse under its own weight, however, as “the Supreme Court began to place greater emphasis upon the separation of powers concerns underlying the Article III standing requirement,” Chenoweth v. Clinton, 181 F.3d 112, 114 (D.C. Cir. 1999), and after Raines v. Byrd, 521 U.S. 811 (1997), our “broad theory of legislative standing” became untenable, see Chenoweth, 181 F.3d at 117 n.*. Notwithstanding our court’s past ill-advised effort to mediate battles between the political branches, the fact remains that the High Court has yet to sanction such an intrusion and we, an inferior court, should not take it upon ourselves to alter the balance of powers. The majority “opinion is like a pirate ship. It sails under a [separation-of-powers] flag,” Bostock v. Clayton Cnty., 140 S. Ct. 1731, 1755 (2020) (Alito, J., joined by Thomas, J., dissenting); see, e.g., Majority Op. at 36–37, but in fact undermines the calibrated system of interbranch conflict resolution the Constitution requires.

Granted, “merely invoking separation of powers principles,” Majority Op. at 20, does not automatically preclude us from exercising the judicial power. Indeed, this case implicates the separation of powers in multiple ways, not all of which affect the Committee’s standing. The “separation of powers concerns” that arise in an “interbranch conflict” over “[c]ongressional demands for the President’s information,” Trump v. Mazars USA, LLP, 140 S. Ct. 2019, 2035 (2020), do not necessarily place a suit beyond our ken, see NLRB v. Noel Canning, 573 U.S. 513, 525 (2014) (“[I]t is the ‘duty of the judicial department’—in a separation-of-powers case as in any other—‘to say what the law is.’” (quoting Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137, 177 (1803))). But there is also the “time-honored concern about keeping the Judiciary’s power within its proper constitutional sphere,” Raines, 521 U.S. at 820, and this separation-of-powers element, indivisible from Article III standing, “confines the federal courts to a properly judicial role,” Spokeo, 136 S. Ct. at 1547.

Although the majority appears to recognize as much, see, e.g., Majority Op. at 19–20, it gives short shrift to the fact that an injury must therefore be “personal, particularized, concrete, and otherwise judicially cognizable,” Raines, 521 U.S. at 820 (emphasis added), “to ensure that federal courts do not exceed their authority as it has been traditionally understood,” Spokeo, 136 S. Ct. at 1547. Legislative bodies are not exempt from the requirement that “an injury must be ‘legally and judicially cognizable,’” Va. House of Delegates v. Bethune-Hill, 139 S. Ct. 1945, 1953 (2019) (quoting Raines, 521 U.S. at 819), and Article III standing may be wanting if, after “consult[ing] history and judicial tradition,” Ariz. State Legislature v. Ariz. Indep. Redistricting Comm’n, 135 S. Ct. 2652, 2695 (2015) (Scalia, J., joined by Thomas, J., dissenting), the dispute is not “of the sort traditionally amenable to, and resolved by, the judicial process,” Steel Co. v. Citizens for a Better Env’t, 523 U.S. 83, 102 (1998). Simply put, we must consider whether the Committee’s “attempt to invoke the power of a federal court . . . is consistent with the structure created by the Federal Constitution” and “[a]n interest . . . that is inconsistent with that structure may not be judicially cognizable.” Bethune-Hill, 139 S. Ct. at 1959 (Alito, J., joined by Roberts, C.J., Breyer, J., and Kavanaugh, J., dissenting).

I continue to believe the longstanding practice of resolving political disputes without judicial intervention counsels against the Committee’s standing here. “[T]he Constitution established that ‘[j]udicial power could come into play only in matters that were the traditional concern of the courts at Westminster,’” Vt. Agency of Nat. Res. v. United States ex rel. Stevens, 529 U.S. 765, 774 (2000) (second alteration in original) (quoting Coleman v. Miller, 307 U.S. 433, 460 (1939) (Frankfurter, J., dissenting)), and “[c]ertainly neither the houses of Parliament nor the British monarchs ever considered submitting their disputes to the courts,” JOSH CHAFETZ, CONGRESS’S

CONSTITUTION 190 (2017). Likewise, “in analogous confrontations between one or both Houses of Congress and the Executive Branch, no suit was brought on the basis of claimed injury to official authority or power,” Raines, 521 U.S. at 826, despite the fact that these “decades-long disputes . . . would surely have been promptly resolved by a Congress-vs.-the-President lawsuit if the impairment of a branch’s powers alone conferred standing to commence litigation. But it does not, and never has . . .” United States v. Windsor, 570 U.S. 744, 790 (2013) (Scalia, J., joined by Roberts, C.J., and Thomas, J., dissenting).<sup>1</sup>

Just last month, the Supreme Court emphasized that interbranch disputes like this one “have not ended up in court. Instead, they have been hashed out in the ‘hurly-burly, the give-and-take of the political process between the legislative and the executive.’” Mazars, 140 S. Ct. at 2029 (quoting Executive Privilege—Secrecy in Government: Hearings on S. 2170, S. 2378 and S. 2420 Before the Subcomm. on Intergovernmental Rels. of the S. Comm. on Gov’t Operations, 94th Cong. 87 (1975) (statement of Antonin Scalia, Assistant Att’y Gen., Office of Legal Counsel)). Under the guise of “preserv[ing] . . . that historical practice of accommodation,” Majority Op. at 23, the majority posits that without the possibility “of a subpoena enforcement lawsuit”—i.e., a judicial remedy—“the Executive Branch faces little incentive to reach a negotiated agreement in an informational dispute” with the Congress, id. at 24. But

---

<sup>1</sup> The majority is quick to cabin Raines to its facts. But even accepting, arguendo, the majority’s premise “that Raines is a narrow case about the standing only of individual legislators,” Majority Op. at 30, it does not follow that Raines’s discussion of historical practice is therefore stripped of persuasive effect, cf. Windsor, 570 U.S. at 790 (Scalia, J., joined by Roberts, C.J., and Thomas, J., dissenting) (“Raines d[oes] not formally decide this issue, but its reasoning does.”).

“[f]or more than two centuries, the political branches have resolved information disputes” themselves. Mazars, 140 S. Ct. at 2035.

In suggesting that the Judiciary is needed to “keep[] the Executive Branch at the negotiating table,” Majority Op. at 24, the majority largely ignores “the wide variety of means that the Constitution puts at [the House’s] disposal,” Mazars, 140 S. Ct. at 2035, if a recalcitrant President orders “widescale non-compliance with lawful inquiries by a House of Congress,” Majority Op. at 25. The House may, for example, withhold appropriations or, as it did here, impeach the President for “[d]irecting the . . . def[iance of] a lawful subpoena.” H.R. Res. 755, 116th Cong., at 6 (2019).<sup>2</sup> Thus, even if the House is unlikely to invoke its inherent contempt authority or pursue a criminal prosecution, see Majority Op. at 33–34, it is untrue that “no practicable alternative to litigation exists,” id. at 26. The political process may be messy, subject to the pitfalls of supercharged partisanship, but “we must put aside the natural urge . . . to ‘settle’ [this dispute] for the sake of convenience and efficiency,” Raines, 521 U.S. at 820, no matter how tantalizing a “judicial alternative” appears, Majority Op. at 34.

---

<sup>2</sup> Although the Constitution expressly provides these mechanisms to resolve interbranch conflict, it is notably silent on the Judiciary’s role in such disputes. Considering Article III carved out “as specific, independent categories of federal judicial power, ‘controversies’ between states, between a state and citizens of another state, and so on[,] . . . it is incredible that Framers who intended to extend judicial power to direct controversies between Congress and the President failed to include so important a category in their recitation.” Barnes v. Kline, 759 F.2d 21, 57 (D.C. Cir. 1984) (Bork, J., dissenting), vacated sub nom. Burke v. Barnes, 479 U.S. 361 (1987).

By holding that the Committee has standing, the majority enlarges the Judiciary's power to intervene in battles that should be waged between the Legislature and the Executive and opens the door to future disputes between the political branches. Cf. Warth v. Seldin, 422 U.S. 490, 498 (1975) (“[Standing] is founded in concern about the proper—and properly limited—role of the courts in a democratic society.”). Even if “the precise function” we perform in this case—subpoena enforcement—“is a traditional feature of civil litigation in federal court,” Majority Op. at 27, “congressional subpoenas directed at” the Executive Branch “differ markedly” because they “unavoidably pit the political branches against one another,” Mazars, 140 S. Ct. at 2034. This distinction matters. If the interbranch character of the dispute was of no consequence, any President could presumably challenge in court laws that he believes infringe upon Article II powers. And statutory interpretation, like subpoena enforcement, is also a “familiar judicial exercise.” Majority Op. at 26 (quoting Zivotofsky ex rel. Zivotofsky v. Clinton, 566 U.S. 189, 196 (2012)). Although “[t]here would be nothing irrational about a system that granted standing in” such a case, “it is obviously not the regime that has obtained under our Constitution to date.” Raines, 521 U.S. at 828. “In limiting the judicial power to ‘Cases’ and ‘Controversies,’ Article III of the Constitution restricts it to the traditional role of Anglo-American courts,” Summers v. Earth Island Inst., 555 U.S. 488, 492 (2009), which did not hear suits between coordinate branches of government. The majority’s broad conception of legislative standing, however, disregards this limitation. Accordingly, I respectfully dissent.

GRIFFITH, Circuit Judge, dissenting: Today the court relegates the separation of powers from a core component of Article III to an afterthought. The court severs the standing analysis from its separation-of-powers roots and treats a direct dispute between the Legislative and Executive Branches as if it were any old case. The result is an anemic Article III jurisprudence that flouts a long line of Supreme Court precedent, ignores the basic structure of the Constitution, and resuscitates long-discredited case law from this circuit.

And for what? Who benefits from today's decision? Not Congress. The majority's ruling will supplant negotiation with litigation, making it harder for Congress to secure the information it needs. And the Committee likely won't even get what it wants in this case. Because the majority declines to decide whether the Committee has a cause of action and whether it should prevail on the merits, the chances that the Committee hears McGahn's testimony anytime soon are vanishingly slim. The federal courts won't benefit, either. The majority's decision will compel us to referee an interminable series of interbranch disputes, politicizing the Judiciary by repeatedly forcing us to take sides between the branches. Most importantly, the decision does grave harm to the Constitution's system of separated powers, which constrains federal courts to the narrow task of resolving concrete "Cases" and "Controversies" so that elected representatives call the political shots. I cannot join the court's expedition into an area where we do not belong and can do no good.

I

The most puzzling aspect of today's decision is the court's disregard for the relationship between Article III and the separation of powers. Heedless of the interbranch nature of this dispute, the majority trots through the three-part standing test from Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555 (1992), as if the Committee were just like a private party enforcing a subpoena in a breach-of-contract suit. The majority returns this circuit to the prudential approach to standing that we experimented with decades ago and that the Supreme Court rejected in Raines v. Byrd, 521 U.S. 811 (1997). And the court fails to offer any limits to its revived doctrine of congressional standing, leaving future panels to struggle to find a coherent stopping point.

2

A

The majority's disregard for the separation of powers is apparent on the face of the opinion. The court announces its "skepticism" that "the separation of powers . . . bear[s] on whether the Committee has Article III standing." Maj. Op. at 20. The Supreme Court might be surprised to hear that. Time and again, the Court has said that standing "is built on a single basic idea—the idea of separation of powers." Raines, 521 U.S. at 820 (internal quotation marks omitted). For that reason, "questions . . . relevant to the standing inquiry must be answered by reference to the Art[icle] III notion that federal courts may exercise power . . . only when adjudication is consistent with a system of separated powers." Allen v. Wright, 468 U.S. 737, 752 (1984); see also id. at 761 n.26; Susan B. Anthony List v. Driehaus, 573 U.S. 149, 157 (2014); Steel Co. v. Citizens for a Better Env't, 523 U.S. 83, 102 (1998); Flast v. Cohen, 392 U.S. 83, 97 (1968).

The "concrete injury" requirement imbues standing doctrine with its "separation-of-powers significance." Lujan, 504 U.S. at 577. That requirement is also "grounded in historical practice," and we must ask whether an alleged harm "has traditionally been regarded as providing a basis for a lawsuit in English or American courts." Spokeo, Inc. v. Robins, 136 S. Ct. 1540, 1549 (2016). The Judiciary does not and never has resolved direct disputes between the political branches. The “traditional role” of the federal courts “is to redress or prevent actual or imminently threatened injury to persons caused by private or official violation of law.” Summers v. Earth Island Inst., 555 U.S. 488, 492 (2009). Interbranch disputes thus “lie[] far from the . . . conceptual core of the case-or-controversy requirement.” Raines, 521 U.S. at 833 (Souter, J., concurring in the judgment); see also Ariz. State Legislature v. Ariz. Indep. Redistricting Comm’n, 135 S. Ct. 2652, 2665 n.12 (2015) (noting that lawsuits between the Legislative and Executive Branches raise “separation-of-powers concerns”).

Those considerations about the traditional role of the Judiciary bear directly on whether the Committee’s asserted injury—deprivation of testimony that hinders the Committee in “carrying out its constitutional functions,” Maj. Op. at 14—suffices to establish standing. We thus cannot evaluate whether this suit presents an Article III case or controversy by abstracting away from the critical facts: the Committee on the Judiciary of the United States House of Representatives is suing the former White House Counsel to compel him to divulge information obtained during the course of his duties, and the Committee seeks that information to effectuate its institutional prerogatives to conduct oversight of the Executive Branch and to impeach the President. The question is whether that injury to the Committee is “legally and judicially cognizable,” and whether that claim is “traditionally thought to be capable of resolution through the judicial process.” Raines, 521 U.S. at 819 (internal quotation marks omitted).

Yet the majority breezes through the injury-in-fact analysis with scarcely a word about the interbranch nature of this dispute. See Maj. Op. at 7-18. Because “private parties undeniably have standing to seek judicial enforcement of compliance with subpoenas,” the majority reasons, the Committee must also have standing to enforce the Executive

4

Branch's compliance with a congressional subpoena. Id. at 14. But that analogy breaks down twice over. First, the fact that we may resolve similar information disputes between private parties does not answer whether we can resolve an interbranch information dispute. Second, although enforcement of a subpoena issued under the auspices of our own Article III power is a "familiar judicial exercise," id. at 26 (quotation marks omitted), there is nothing "[u]sual" or "traditional," id., about the Committee's request that Article III judges enforce an Article I subpoena against an Article II officer.

The majority's entire affirmative case is thus premised on a faulty analogy between an injury to private parties and an injury to Congress. The majority justifies its neglect of the interbranch nature of this dispute by arguing that separation-of-powers concerns require its standing analysis to be "especially rigorous," not that those "separation of powers concern[s] . . . must be part of [its] standing analysis." Id. at 21 (quoting Raines, 521 U.S. at 819-20). I confess I do not know what it means to conduct the "rigorous" standing analysis that the separation of powers requires without considering the separation of powers as part of that analysis. The majority makes no substantive mention of the separation of powers until eighteen pages into the opinion, and even then, it asks only whether "separation of powers principles defeat[]" the outcome of its standing analysis. Id. at 20. The court cannot cure its initial error with a belated and half-hearted discussion of the separation-of-powers considerations that should have informed its injury-in-fact analysis.

B

The Supreme Court has already rejected the majority's two-step approach, in which it considers standing first and the separation of powers later. In a string of decisions beginning in 1974, we held—“[o]ver strong dissent”—“that Members of Congress may have standing when” “they assert injury to their institutional power as legislators.” Raines, 521 U.S. at 820 n.4. Recognizing that separation-of-powers considerations did bear on the justiciability of these suits, however, we developed a doctrine of “circumscribed equitable discretion” so we could dismiss some cases as nonjusticiable even if we found legislative standing. Chenoweth v. Clinton, 181 F.3d 112, 114 (D.C. Cir. 1999). “Keeping distinct our analysis of standing and our consideration of the separation of powers,” we reasoned, allowed us to treat “congressional and private plaintiffs . . . alike for the purpose of determining their standing.” Id.

The Supreme Court rejected that practice in Raines, and we set ourselves straight, until today. After Raines, we recognized that the Supreme Court was “unmoved by [our] concern” that “consideration of separation of powers issues would distort our standing analysis.” Id. at 115 (internal quotation marks omitted). We then concluded that Raines “require[d] us to merge our separation of powers and standing analyses.” Id. at 116. In other words, we rejected the circuit’s bifurcated approach that asked (1) whether “[congressional] plaintiffs [would have] had standing to sue” if they were a private party, and then (2) whether the “separation of powers problems [the lawsuit] created” demanded that we dismiss the suit anyway. Id. at 115.

Despite that course correction, the court again today treats the separation of powers as a backstop on our jurisdiction—an atmospheric concern to be considered only after we decide that a congressional plaintiff has standing. See Maj. Op. at 18-37. The majority dutifully recites Chenoweth’s command to integrate separation-of-powers concerns into the standing analysis, but then goes on to reject the proposition that the separation of powers is a “necessary part of [the] standing analysis.” Maj. Op. at 21. The majority treats the Executive Branch’s separation-of-powers concerns as free-floating objections, asking whether they negate the outcome of a standing analysis conducted oblivious to these concerns. But that approach is backwards, and it replicates this circuit’s discredited pre-Raines effort to consider congressional standing in isolation from the separation of powers.

6

If the Court’s first rebuke in Raines failed to convince us to take separation-of-powers concerns seriously, the second should have. Just a few short weeks ago, the Supreme Court vacated and remanded our decision in a different congressional subpoena case for failing to “take[] adequate account of the separation of powers principles at stake.” Trump v. Mazars USA, LLP, No. 19-715, slip op. at 18, 20 (U.S. July 9, 2020). Still, the court once again expresses “skepticism” that separation-of-powers principles should guide its analysis. Maj. Op. at 20.

C

1

The majority’s return to the D.C. Circuit’s old way—a check-the-box approach to standing coupled with desultory review of the lawsuit’s separation-of-powers implications—places effectively no limitations on Congress’s ability to haul the Executive Branch into court. The majority concludes that the Committee suffered a “concrete” injury because McGahn “denied the Committee something to which it alleges it is entitled by law,” id. at 13, but that reasoning is boundless. Any claim that Congress might bring against the Executive Branch alleges a deprivation of something to which Congress is entitled by law.

Consider just a few possibilities. Under the majority's reasoning, why couldn't Congress (or the House or the Senate or a committee) challenge any Executive Order that allegedly violated the Bicameralism and Presentment Clause? See Chenoweth, 181 F.3d at 113. Or any military action that allegedly violated the Declare War Clause? See Campbell v. Clinton, 203 F.3d 19, 19 (D.C. Cir. 2000). Or one of the Executive Branch's spending decisions that allegedly violated the Appropriations Clause? See U.S. House of Representatives v. Mnuchin, No. 19-5176 (D.C. Cir. Aug. 7, 2020) (Griffith, J., dissenting). Just as in this case, each hypothetical suit involves allegations that Congress has been denied something to which it is entitled by law—the prerogative to enact statutes, or to declare war, or to appropriate funds. The majority's stripped-down conception of standing authorizes Congress to bring all these suits and more.

Worse, if Congress or one of its chambers may sue the Executive Branch, “it must follow that the President may, by the same token, sue Congress.” Barnes v. Kline, 759 F.2d 21, 46 (D.C. Cir. 1984) (Bork, J., dissenting), vacated sub nom. Burke v. Barnes, 479 U.S. 361 (1987). Under the majority's reasoning, whenever Congress passes a statute that the President believes invades his constitutional prerogatives, he could come into court to obtain a judicial declaration on that statute's constitutionality. And why stop at suits between the Legislative and Executive Branches? The D.C. Circuit could sue Congress for stripping its habeas jurisdiction over Guantanamo Bay by alleging that Congress deprived it of its jurisdiction. Cf. id.

Once the courthouse doors are open, there's no reason to expect the branches to be judicious about the suits they bring. Even the General Counsel for the House conceded that allowing such interbranch suits poses a serious “floodgates problem.” Oral Arg. Tr. 100:13; see also id. at 103:23. Given the majority’s conclusion that a deprivation of a legal right satisfies Article III, I see no reason to exclude any of these cases from our jurisdiction. After all, each involves an institutional plaintiff alleging a deprivation of a constitutional prerogative. And because our standing analysis requires us to assume the plaintiff’s success on the merits, we would have to entertain any claim alleging such a deprivation, no matter how outlandish. In short order, we could be forced to interpret constitutional provisions that have traditionally been interpreted by the political branches and “never before . . . by the federal courts,” Schlesinger v. Reservists Comm. to Stop the War, 418 U.S. 208, 221 (1974), and that courts should consider only “in the last resort, and as a necessity,” Raines, 521 U.S. at 819 (internal quotation marks omitted).

That cannot be right. If “the concrete injury requirement has the separation-of-powers significance” that the Supreme Court has “always said” it has, Lujan, 504 U.S. at 577, then the answer to whether these injuries suffice for Article III standing must be a resounding “No.” Components of the government cannot bring suit alleging that another branch has caused the “abstract dilution of institutional . . . power.” Raines, 521 U.S. at 826. When a branch “asserts a ‘right’ that consists of the exercise of (or participation in the exercise of) a political power, the business of the political branches is the very object of the dispute, no matter with what degree of particularity the ‘right’ has been conferred.” Moore v. U.S. House of Representatives, 733 F.2d 946, 958 (D.C. Cir. 1984) (Scalia, J., concurring in the judgment). If the political branches were deemed to have a judicially cognizable interest in the “powers that have been conferred upon them (whether specifically or vaguely) by Constitution or statute,” our system of separated powers would be reduced to a system of “judicial refereeship.”

Id. at 959.

The majority hints (but never says) that the denial of Congress’s right to information is somehow more concrete than other deprivations of institutional rights. But as the majority opinion emphasizes, the reason that McGahn’s refusal to testify harms the House is that it subverts the House’s ability “to legislate, to conduct oversight,” and “to impeach and remove a President.” Maj. Op. at 3. Those injuries are allegations that the House’s institutional prerogatives have been frustrated by the Executive Branch’s assertion of absolute testimonial immunity. And those injuries are no more concrete than any other assertion that the Executive Branch has taken power from Congress, or that Congress has taken power from the President.

Thus, although the majority evaluates only the Committee’s asserted informational harm, its reasoning sweeps far more broadly. And neither the court nor the Committee has offered any principled limitations on that sweep. Indeed, by refusing to resolve the companion case in Mnuchin, the full court passes on the chance to offer guidance about the outer limits of its reasoning. See Mnuchin, No. 19-5176, slip op. at 3-4 (Griffith, J., dissenting). Today’s decision will leave future panels to assess these suits on a case-by-case basis, deciding whether the constitutional power that has allegedly been diluted strikes them as specific enough (or important enough) to intervene. All the while, the branches’ ability to settle matters on their own will grind to a halt as they submit themselves to the D.C. Circuit’s superintendence.

Even assuming that informational injuries are uniquely “concrete” and the majority’s decision can be cabined to just these disputes, the opinion still opens the courthouse doors to unending litigation. The court deems the dispute in today's litigation "discrete and limited," Maj. Op. at 27, but the Committee admitted before the panel that—if McGahn testified and the Committee disagreed with his assertions of executive privilege—it would seek further relief, perhaps through emergency motions, to compel him to talk. See Comm. on the Judiciary v. McGahn, 951 F.3d 510, 518 (D.C. Cir. 2020) (McGahn I), reh'g en banc granted sub nom. U.S. House of Representatives v. Mnuchin, No. 19-5176, 2020 WL 1228477 (D.C. Cir. Mar. 13, 2020). Today's decision invites that litigation, establishing the D.C. Circuit as the continuous monitor of congressional oversight hearings.

Supervising these hearings and other information disputes will be an unhappy task for judges who value the public perception of impartiality. Because "congressional subpoenas for [executive-branch] information unavoidably pit the political branches against one another," Mazars, slip op. at 15, entertaining these suits will invariably put us in the "awkward position" of choosing a winner in repeated contests of power and privilege, Cheney v. U.S. Dist. Court for D.C., 542 U.S. 367, 389 (2004). We will be forced to balance "the Executive's claims of confidentiality and autonomy" against Congress's asserted need for information. Id. And we will have to make such decisions about records and testimony "of intense political interest for all involved." Mazars, slip op. at 17. Resolving these disputes will not just threaten the neutrality of the Judiciary; it will require the branches to submit to our views of their constitutional prerogatives on our timeline. Nobody wins when we place "the Constitution's entirely anticipated political arm wrestling into permanent judicial receivership." United States v. Windsor, 570 U.S. 744, 791 (2013) (Scalia, J., dissenting).

11

II

Unlike the majority, I would integrate the separation-of-powers considerations into the standing analysis. As I have already explained, this dispute is neither “consistent with a system of separated powers” nor “traditionally thought to be capable of resolution through the judicial process.” McGahn I, 951 F.3d at 516 (quoting Allen, 468 U.S. at 752). Accordingly, as discussed at length in the panel opinion, it must be dismissed.

Once again, the Judiciary cannot resolve pure interbranch disputes. Federal courts primarily sit “to decide on the rights of individuals,” Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137, 170 (1803), and our core function is “to redress or prevent actual or imminently threatened injury to persons caused by private or official violation of law,” Summers, 555 U.S. at 492. To be sure, that task sometimes requires us to resolve deeply controversial political disputes. But we resolve those disputes “only in the last resort, and as a necessity in the determination of [a] real, earnest, and vital controversy between individuals.” Chicago & G.T. Ry. v. Wellman, 143 U.S. 339, 345 (1892). Because we address such disputes only “in the course of carrying out the judicial function” of resolving cases or controversies, DaimlerChrysler Corp. v. Cuno, 547 U.S. 332, 340 (2006), we cannot intervene in an interbranch dispute unless and until the actions of one of the branches harms an entity “beyond the [Federal] Government,” Raines, 521 U.S. at 834 (Souter, J., concurring in the judgment).

It is no accident that every major separation-of-powers case to reach the Supreme Court in the Nation’s history fits exactly that pattern. In Marbury v. Madison, William Marbury sought his “commission as a justice of the peace.” 5 U.S. at 154. Humphrey’s Executor arose because William Humphrey’s estate sought to collect backpay after President Roosevelt fired Humphrey. 295 U.S. 602, 618-19 (1935). In INS v. Chadha, Jagdish Rai Chadha—a man admitted to the United States on a student visa—sought to remain in the country. 462 U.S. 919, 923 (1983). United States v. Nixon arose out of a judicial subpoena issued in the “regular course of [the] federal criminal prosecution” of seven Watergate burglars. 418 U.S. 683, 687, 697 (1974). And both Free Enterprise Fund and Seila Law involved private companies subject to government investigations. Seila Law LLC v. CFPB, No. 19-7, slip op. at 6 (U.S. June 29, 2020); Free Enter. Fund v. Pub. Co. Accounting Oversight Bd., 561 U.S. 477, 487 (2010); see also McGahn I, 951 F.3d at 520-21 (listing other separation-of-powers cases that all involved the “concrete interests of private actors”).

Neither the Committee nor the court identifies a single example of a direct interbranch dispute—on any issue—resolved by the Supreme Court. Ever. The Supreme Court’s explanation in Raines remains true today: History is replete with “confrontations between one or both Houses of Congress and the Executive Branch,” but until recently, “no suit was brought on the basis of claimed injury to official authority or power.” Raines, 521 U.S. at 826. If a chamber of Congress could sue the Executive Branch to enforce its institutional prerogatives—be it the right to participate in appointments, or the right to vote to go to war—the U.S. Reports should be littered with these claims. They are not.

The same is true of the subset of interbranch disputes at issue here: conflicts about information. Since the Founding, “congressional demands for [executive-branch] information have been resolved by the political branches without involving [the] [c]ourt[s].” Mazars, slip op. at 9. The only remotely similar dispute that the Supreme Court has ever addressed involved the rights of private parties; Mazars was brought by “the President in his personal capacity” and “his children and affiliated businesses” against a third-party accounting firm. Id. at 5 (emphasis added). Altogether, the “complete novelty of the direct intermediation of the courts in disputes between the President and the Congress[] ought to give us pause.” Barnes, 759 F.2d at 41 (Bork, J., dissenting).

But as with the separation of powers, the majority dismisses this history as extraneous to the standing analysis, suggesting that the Supreme Court has never “append[ed]” a “historical prong” to the three-part standing test elucidated in Lujan. Maj. Op. at 34. No, there is no fourth prong, but in determining whether a “harm constitutes [an] injury in fact,” “history . . . play[s an] important role[.]” Spokeo, 136 S. Ct. at 1549. The Supreme Court has repeatedly emphasized that Article III limits us to adjudicating claims “traditionally thought to be capable of resolution through the judicial process.” Allen, 468 U.S. at 752 (internal quotation marks omitted); see also Lujan, 504 U.S. at 559-60 (explaining that our jurisdiction “depends largely upon common understanding of what activities are appropriate to legislatures, to executives, and to courts”); Rucho v. Common Cause, 139 S. Ct. 2484, 2494 (2019); Raines, 521 U.S. at 818-20; Flast v. Cohen, 392 U.S. 83, 97 (1968). How else could we identify the “traditional” limits on our jurisdiction without consulting that history?

And the best history that the majority can muster is four decisions all within the last forty-five years—two in this circuit, two in the district court. See Maj. Op. at 23-24. But “[t]hese few scattered examples . . . shed little light” on the constitutionality of judicial resolution of interbranch disputes. Seila Law, slip op. at 19 (internal quotation marks omitted). The majority professes itself untroubled by the rarity and recency of these historical examples, speculating that perhaps a “long tradition of Presidential cooperation” minimized the need for such suits in the past. Maj. Op. at 36. But Presidents of all stripes—including Washington, Adams, Jefferson, Monroe, Lincoln, Theodore Roosevelt, Franklin Roosevelt, Truman, Carter, Reagan, Bush, and Obama—withheld information from Congress during their presidencies. See Comm. on Oversight & Gov’t Reform v. Holder, 979 F. Supp. 2d 1, 5-7 (D.D.C. 2013); Comm. on the Judiciary v. Miers, 558 F. Supp. 2d 53, 57-64 (D.D.C. 2008); History of Refusals by Executive Branch Officials to Provide Information Demanded by Congress, 6 Op. O.L.C. 751, 751-81 (1982).

It is the majority’s view that is the outlier. For years, the political branches agreed to resolve their interbranch information disputes with negotiation rather than litigation. Even setting aside the nearly unbroken history of political resolution of interbranch information disputes leading up to our adventurous decisions in the 1970s, the political branches have each recently opposed the majority’s conclusion. For instance, the Bush and Obama Administrations both resisted judicial resolution of these disputes. See Mem. in Supp. of Def.’s Mot. to Dismiss at 30, Comm. on Oversight & Reform v. Holder, No. 12-cv-1332 (D.D.C. Oct. 15, 2012), Dkt. No. 13-1 (President Obama); Mem. in Supp. of Def.’s Mot. to Dismiss at 24, Comm. on the Judiciary v. Miers, No. 08-cv-0409 (D.D.C. May 9, 2008), Dkt. No. 16-1 (President Bush).

And despite the Committee’s current litigating position, Congress has also long agreed that these disputes are not fit for judicial resolution. During the Watergate impeachment investigation of President Nixon, for instance, the Committee on the Judiciary concluded that it “would be inappropriate to seek the aid of the courts to enforce its subpoenas against the President.” H.R. REP. NO. 93-1305, at 210 (1974). “The Committee’s determination not to seek to involve the judiciary reflected not only an intent to preserve the constitutional structure, but also the high probability that the courts would decline to rule on the merits of the case because it is . . . not the kind of controversy courts traditionally resolve.” Id. at 210-11 (emphasis added) (internal quotation marks omitted).

The statutory regime for judicial enforcement of congressional subpoenas reflects this same judgment. Only the Senate has express statutory authority to enforce a subpoena in federal court, see 2 U.S.C. § 288d; In re U.S. Senate Permanent Subcomm. on Investigations, 655 F.2d 1232, 1238 & n.28 (D.C. Cir. 1981), but not if the suits involve executive-branch assertions of “governmental privilege,” 28 U.S.C. § 1365(a). As the law’s sponsors explained, the statute’s “purpose is to keep disputes between the executive and legislative branches out of the courtroom.” 142 CONG. REC. 19412 (1996) (statement of Sen. Specter); see also id. at 19413 (statement of Sen. Levin) (similar). This case is just such a controversy; McGahn’s sole argument on the merits is that “Congress may not constitutionally compel the President’s senior advisers”—like McGahn—“to testify about their official duties.” McGahn Panel Br. 47 (internal quotation marks omitted).

By privileging four recent lower-court decisions over 200 years of tradition, the majority “needlessly disturb[s] the compromises and working arrangements that [the] branches themselves have reached.” Mazars, slip op. at 11 (cleaned up). “Congress and the Executive have . . . managed for over two centuries to resolve [information] disputes among themselves without the benefit of guidance from [the courts].” Id. The majority protests that its decision actually “preserv[es]” “the status quo ante between the branches,” Maj. Op. at 30, but that assertion is doubly wrong. The paucity of historical analogues to this suit belies the claim that the majority’s decision reflects the status quo. And the majority’s defense of congressional standing does not preserve but displaces the system of accommodation that is the status quo. With litigation on the table, neither side has an incentive to cooperate. “Instead of negotiating over information requests,” Congress or the Executive Branch “could simply walk away from the bargaining table” and force a resolution by judges. Mazars, slip op. at 16. The inevitable result is that we will become courts not of last but of first resort.

16

III

Sometimes the temptation to wrongly expand our jurisdiction stems from “the natural urge to proceed directly to the merits of [an] important dispute and to ‘settle’ it for the sake of convenience and efficiency.” Raines, 521 U.S. at 820. But here, the full court hurdles over Article III’s barriers only to decline to resolve the case. The majority remands the case to the panel to decide whether the Committee has a cause of action and whether it should prevail on the merits. Congress has already waited over fourteen months for a resolution; the court tells it to hurry up and wait some more. As in Mnuchin, I cannot agree with my colleagues’ decision to force the political branches to wait patiently while we work our way through these important cases. See Mnuchin, slip op. at 3-4 (Griffith, J., dissenting). I would hold that the Committee lacks a cause of action to prosecute its case against McGahn.

A

In addition to demonstrating standing, the Committee must also show that it has a cause of action that supports an injunction compelling McGahn to testify. Our case law forecloses that argument.

“Prior to 1978 Congress had only two means of enforcing compliance with its subpoenas: [1] a statutory criminal contempt mechanism and [2] the inherent congressional contempt power.” In re Application of the U.S. Senate Permanent Subcomm. on Investigations, 655 F.2d at 1238 (footnote omitted). Neither means allowed for judicial enforcement of a subpoena. “Responding to this deficiency, Congress enacted [a] mechanism for civil enforcement of Senate subpoenas” in 1978. Id. (emphasis added). That law allows “the Senate [to] request a court order requiring [an] individual to comply with [a] subpoena.” Id. By my count, that comes to just three “means of enforcing compliance with [congressional] subpoenas”—a criminal contempt proceeding, an inherent contempt proceeding, and a civil suit authorized by statute. Id. But the statute that Congress passed in 1978 “does not . . . include civil enforcement of subpoenas by the House of Representatives.” Id. at 1238 n.28. And Congress has passed no further statutes authorizing the House to bring such suits. Because the D.C. Circuit has identified only these three ways for Congress to enforce compliance with its subpoenas, that precedent forecloses the Committee’s efforts to litigate this case.

B

Even if the panel were not bound by this precedent on remand, the Committee would still lack a cause of action. The Committee argues that it has an implied cause of action under Article I, that it can invoke the traditional power of courts of equity to enjoin unlawful executive action, and that the Declaratory Judgment Act provides a separate basis for this suit. None suffices.

Start with Article I. The Committee argues that it is “entitled under Article I to seek equitable relief to enforce a subpoena . . . issued in furtherance of its constitutional power of inquiry.” Committee Panel Br. 34 (internal quotation marks omitted). But time and again, the Supreme Court has warned federal courts to hesitate before implying causes of actions—whether from a congressional statute or from the Constitution. See, e.g., Jesner v. Arab Bank, PLC, 138 S. Ct. 1386, 1402 (2018); Ziglar v. Abbasi, 137 S. Ct. 1843, 1857 (2017); Alexander v. Sandoval, 532 U.S. 275, 286-87 (2001). “When a party seeks to assert an implied cause of action under the Constitution itself, . . . separation-of-powers principles are or should be central to the analysis,” Ziglar, 137 S. Ct. at 1857, and usually Congress “should decide” whether to authorize a lawsuit, id. (internal quotation marks omitted).

In this case, Congress has declined to authorize lawsuits like the Committee’s twice over. First, Congress has granted an express cause of action to the Senate—but not to the House. See 2 U.S.C. § 288d. Second, the Senate’s cause-of-action statute expressly excludes suits that involve executive-branch assertions of “governmental privilege.” 28 U.S.C. § 1365(a). The expression of one thing implies the exclusion of the other, and authorizing the Committee to bring its lawsuit would conflict with two separate limitations on civil suits to enforce congressional subpoenas. We should not read these carefully drafted limitations out of the statute books.

The Committee suggests that—even if Article I alone doesn’t provide a cause of action—the court may exercise its “traditional equitable powers” to grant relief. Ziglar, 137 S. Ct. at 1856. But those powers remain “subject to express and implied statutory limitations,” Armstrong v. Exceptional Child Ctr., Inc., 575 U.S. 320, 327 (2015), and are further limited to relief that was “traditionally accorded by courts of equity,” Grupo Mexicano de Desarrollo S.A. v. All. Bond Fund, Inc., 527 U.S. 308, 319 (1999). Again, “implied statutory limitations” foreclose suits by the House and suits that implicate a governmental privilege; this one checks both boxes.

Anyway, there’s nothing “traditional” about the Committee’s claim. The Committee cannot point to a single example in which a chamber of Congress brought suit for injunctive relief against the Executive Branch prior to the 1970s. Interbranch suits “lie[] far from the model of the traditional common-law cause of action at the conceptual core of the case-or-controversy requirement.” Raines, 521 U.S. at 833 (Souter, J., concurring in the judgment). While equity may be “flexible,” “that flexibility is confined within the broad boundaries of traditional equitable relief.” Grupo Mexicano, 527 U.S. at 322. We cannot simply reference “equity” to justify a vast expansion of our authority to enforce congressional subpoenas.

Finally, the Committee claims that the Declaratory Judgment Act allows it to bring suit. See 28 U.S.C. § 2201(a). This argument is even less persuasive. The Declaratory Judgment Act does not itself “provide a cause of action,” as the “availability of declaratory relief presupposes the existence of a judicially remediable right.” Ali v. Rumsfeld, 649 F.3d 762, 778 (D.C. Cir. 2011) (cleaned up); see also C&E Servs., Inc. of Wash. v. D.C. Water & Sewer Auth., 310 F.3d 197, 201 (D.C. Cir. 2002). That statute is “procedural only” and simply “enlarge[s] the range of remedies available in the federal courts.” Skelly Oil Co. v. Phillips Petroleum Co., 339 U.S. 667, 671 (1950) (internal quotation marks omitted). Because Article I does not create a “judicially remediable right” to enforce a congressional subpoena, the Committee cannot use the Declaratory Judgment Act to bootstrap its way into federal court. Thus, even if the Committee could establish the standing necessary to “get[] [it] through the courthouse door, [that] does not keep [it] there.” Make the Road N.Y. v. Wolf, 962 F.3d 612,

20

631 (D.C. Cir. 2020). Without a cause of action to sustain it, the Committee's suit must be dismissed.

IV

The majority's opinion is a Pyrrhic victory for Congress. Courts have many virtues, but dispatch is not one of them. "To the extent that enforcement of congressional subpoenas is left to the courts, future administrations [will] now know that they can delay compliance for years," all while avoiding the traditional political cost associated with refusing to negotiate with Congress in good faith. Josh Chafetz, Executive Branch Contempt of Congress, 76 U. CHI. L. REV. 1083, 1154 (2009).

This case, and its unresolved companion in Mnuchin, illustrates the costs of delay. Despite agreeing to hear this case on an expedited schedule, more than fourteen months have passed since the House issued its subpoena. Yet final resolution of the Committee's claim is nowhere in sight. And bear in mind that the majority says that this case presents a "discrete and limited" legal question. Maj. Op. at 27. How much longer will it take the courts to decide more intricate questions of power and privilege? The fact is that Congress has never successfully obtained information from an executive-branch official in a lawsuit. Indeed, our circuit previously declined to expedite the appeal of a legislative subpoena case because it could not be "fully and finally resolved by the Judicial Branch—including resolution by a panel and possible rehearing by this court en banc and by the Supreme Court—before [that] Congress end[ed]" and its subpoenas "expir[ed]." Comm. on the Judiciary of U.S. House of Representatives v. Miers, 542 F.3d 909, 911 (D.C. Cir. 2008).

And the majority's decision to open the courthouse doors to these futile lawsuits comes at a serious cost. The option of litigation weakens Congress's ultimate lever of accountability: its impeachment power. In the past, the House Judiciary Committee has treated the Executive Branch's failure to cooperate in an investigation as grounds for an impeachment. See H.R. REP. NO. 116-346, at 155 & n.906 (2019) (President Trump); H.R. RES. NO. 93-625 (1973) (President Nixon). But once litigation is a viable option, the President can always defend against accusations of executive-branch stonewalling by turning around and reproaching Congress for bypassing the courts—just as the President did here. See Trial Memorandum of President Donald J. Trump, In Proceedings Before the United States Senate 49, 53 (Jan. 20, 2020). Today's decision thus grants Congress the sluggish remedy of judicial superintendence only to blunt the most potent weapon in its arsenal.

The court seems to think that the alternative—leaving these disputes to the traditional process of negotiation and accommodation—is even worse. But Congress has powerful and varied tools to deal with a recalcitrant Executive Branch. It may withhold appropriations, refuse to confirm presidential nominees, prevent the President from implementing his legislative agenda, and wield public opinion against the President. At the extreme, the Legislative Branch may hold uncooperative officers in contempt of Congress or even impeach them.

The majority worries that these political remedies are “impracticable,” Maj. Op. at 34, and it offers judicial enforcement as a supplement. But judicial involvement cannot solve Congress's problems when political tools fail. Courts cannot ensure that the Legislative Branch gets timely access to information from a dilatory Executive Branch; we take too long. Courts also cannot intervene without displacing the centuries-old system of negotiation, accommodation, and (sometimes) political retaliation; one party or the other—likely an Executive Branch that benefits from delay—will walk away from the bargaining table and force litigation. And even if Congress eventually prevails in court, we cannot be sure that a “President [who] loses the lawsuit”—having already defied Congress and withstood political pressure—will “faithfully implement the [c]ourt’s decree.” Windsor, 570 U.S. at 791 (Scalia, J., dissenting).

Worst of all, we cannot offer the political branches the remedy of judicial enforcement without squandering the precious reserve of public confidence that makes our judgments efficacious in the first place. Article III’s limitations are for the other branches’ protection, but they are for our protection too. Parties respect neither our “force” nor our “will” but our “judgment.” FEDERALIST NO. 78 (Alexander Hamilton). If we venture into this increasingly politicized territory, we risk undermining that neutrality and losing the public’s trust. We do neither ourselves nor the parties any favors by embarking down this path, and I would leave the political branches to resolve their disputes through the political process—as the Constitution demands. Respectfully, I dissent.