

APPELLATE LITIGATION GRADUATE TEACHING FELLOWSHIP
GEORGETOWN UNIVERSITY LAW CENTER
2023-2025

The Appellate Litigation Program offers a two-year graduate fellowship for candidates training as appellate advocates in the federal courts. The Appellate Litigation Program accepts appointments to represent indigent clients in appeals that address a broad range of issues, including habeas, civil rights, and immigration matters. In addition to arguing at least one case in a federal court of appeals, the fellows work with students and the Director on cases pending in the federal courts of appeals, the United States Supreme Court, and the Board of Immigration Appeals. The fellows work on all aspects of the appeals and are responsible for supervising student written work and oral advocacy preparation. This fellowship will develop the fellows' skills as clinicians, appellate litigators, and supervising attorneys.

The fellows also jointly teach (with the Director) the Appellate Litigation Program's weekly seminar, exploring many aspects of appellate advocacy, client-centered lawyering, and professional responsibility. Fellows also have the opportunity to work with Georgetown's Supreme Court Institute that conducts moot courts for attorneys preparing to argue before the Supreme Court of the United States. The fellowship helps prepare fellows for careers in teaching and/or litigation.

The next available fellowship will begin in the summer of 2023. Applications will be considered on a rolling basis, with a priority deadline of January 15, 2023.
